It would be impossible to overestimate the importance of the present subject, the Vatican, wherein Michelangelo performed his mightiest works, the terrific Last Judgment, and the monumental Prophets and Sibyls of the Sistine Chapel; and where Raphael painted his sublimest compositions, the great frescoes of the Stanze, and the exquisite arabesques of the Loggie.

Preface

To describe even superficially all the art treasures of the Vatican would require many fat volumes. To consider fully the contents of only one of its many departments would take the entire space allowed for the present work. The question then has been, under the title of "The Art of the Vatican," what shall be chosen as representative of that art, and how much room shall be given to each subject. Into this choice, of course, the personal equation must largely enter. Probably all will agree that none of the galleries, museums, and chapels included here could be omitted. The only doubt would be concerning the exclusion of other divisions. The reason for ignoring the Library, the Egyptian and Etruscan Museums, and the Pauline Chapel, may seem to many difficult of comprehension. The pre-eminence of the sections selected being acknowledged, however, there remain but two ways to admit others within these covers. The first, of course, would be to devote less space to each subject. That, however, in the opinion of the writer, would be to defeat the principal object of the book. If the descriptions were much shortened, the volume becomes little more than a bare catalogue. And there are already plenty of catalogues of the Vatican collections. The other method would be to cut out the chapter devoted to the palace as a whole, and give its place to the collections above mentioned. This has seemed an undesirable alternative. It was felt that the preliminary account of the building, and the brief mention of the part it has played in the history of the centuries, gave the work a homogeneity, a unity, not otherwise attainable.

The same reasoning applies to the actual paintings and sculptures described in each gallery or chapel. It has been thought better to devote as much consideration as possible to the most noted of the works rather than to speak more briefly of many. In this way it is hoped that the book may be valuable both for travellers, who wish to have something more than mere guide-book information of the great treasures of Rome, and for the amateur who has not sufficient time or desire to consult the many original works necessary for a thorough art training.

It is probably not necessary to remind the reader that a book of this kind can be little more than a compilation of a few of the opinions of the critics, archæologists, and historians who are recognised authorities, each in his own field. There is practically no room for original research or criticism. The most that can be claimed is an honest endeavour to cull the very best from a tremendous mass of often conflicting opinions, and to present the result as clearly and succinctly as possible. If a deep personal love for some particular works has sometimes led the writer to give undue prominence to them, at least she has been able to fortify her position by the equally strongly expressed likes of the greatest of the art critics.

One thing more. Even at the risk of being tiresome, much space has been given to very exact and literal descriptions of the composition of pictures and of the attitudes of statues. Nothing fastens a scene in one's mind so firmly as to know how it is actually depicted. To discuss, for instance, the grandeur of pose of a certain figure means comparatively little unless one knows where the figure is to be found and what it is doing in any given composition. In other words, the verbal descriptions, it is hoped, will help to recall more quickly the picture or statue to those who have already seen it, and will also bring it more distinctly before the mental vision of those who have not.

Guide-books and even art books are singularly silent regarding the amount of modern restoring that has often nearly remade many of the masterpieces of a bygone day. The young traveller in consequence, when he first sees the fresh, vivid colours of frescoes and pictures and the unbroken arms and legs of statues, must be greatly perplexed to know what is of to-day and what of yesterday. For this reason efforts have been made to give at least a general impression as to how far this work of restoration has been carried on. The writer is particularly indebted to Wolfgang Helbig for his explicit statements concerning the additions made since their discovery to ancient statues.

Finally, it is certainly unnecessary to remark that, in such a volume as this, it is practically impossible wholly to keep mistakes from creeping in. The writer claims no infallibility in her judgment or selections, but she sincerely hopes that her earnest efforts have succeeded in keeping the book moderately free from errors.

The Art of the Vatican

CHAPTER I.

THE VATICAN PALACE

IN mighty, irregular, unbeautiful masses, the Palace of the Popes rears itself beside St. Peter's, its huge, angular pile almost dwarfing the great cathedral itself. The product of many centuries, its construction the result of many differing minds as well as times, its appearance from the outside suggests a helter-skelter conglomeration of big factories or towering tenements. It is as if giants, standing on the seven hills of Rome, had played a monstrous game in which walls, windows, porticoes, loggie, courts, and roofs were hurled down into the Borgo, striking where they would and adhering where they struck. So little apparent plan is there in this mountainous pile of buildings. The dull, muddy yellow of the walls does not make its architectural sins any less aggressive. In fact, outwardly, as a composite achievement of the generations that have lavished untold gold upon its building, it must be accounted an egregious architectural failure.

There is little chance, however, for viewing the Vatican as a whole. Only from the balcony around the lantern of St. Peter's can the entire extent of the sprawling mass be seen. Practically, the palace must be studied as it was built, — piecemeal. Thus considered in detachments, it shows much of beauty and interest. Unfortunately, the very worst of it is that part seen first and last by the visitor in Rome. The ugly divisions that rise at the right of St. Peter's, over Bernini's colonnade, do not hint of the loggie about the Court of St. Damasus or the long lines of galleries leading to the graceful Belvedere. These fiercely windowed, jaundiced walls suggest the many real beauties of the Vatican as little as they proclaim the marvellous treasures of art collected within them. To get a true appreciation of these architectural triumphs, it is necessary to view them not only with the eye of present sight, but with the eye of retrospection as well. Even a short and necessarily incomplete account of the why and when they were built will tend to give a truer basis for opinion as to their worth and success.

The Vatican as it is to-day, with its outbuildings, gardens, and grounds, covers a space equal in area to a city with a population of a hundred and thirty thousand. Compared in size with the palace alone, even the Colosseum sinks into insignificance. For the Colosseum would not quite fill up the ground plan of St. Peter's. And it would take all of St. Peter's and more than half as much again to equal the extent of the Vatican.

Roughly speaking, the shape of the Vatican is that of two separate and wholly dissimilar groups of buildings on the slope of the hill at the foot of which is St. Peter's. These groups are connected by two narrow parallel galleries about a thousand feet long and two hundred and forty feet apart. These in turn are joined near the middle by two cross-galleries, dividing the enclosed space into two rectangular courts. The huge edifice at the southern end of these galleries is connected with St. Peter's, and is really the palace proper. Here, within its vast, irregular walls, are the Pope's private apartments, those of several cardinals, the Sistine Chapel, Pauline Chapel, Borgia Tower, the Stanze and Loggie of Raphael, and the Court of St. Damasus. The group at the other end, made more beautiful in line and mass, is smaller as well as more homogeneous. This still keeps its old appellation of the Belvedere, given it when it was the summer house of the Popes, and entirely unconnected with the palace. Named the Belvedere because of the lovely views from it, the windows still look out over the walls of the Eternal City. There have been fabulous stories told of the number of rooms in the palace. Including anterooms, closets, guard-rooms and the like, they have been computed as high as twenty-two thousand. The best authorities, however, give them as about seven thousand, with over two hundred staircases and twenty courts. By far the larger and more important of these are given up to the galleries, libraries, and chapels. The Pope's own apartments are, in comparison, most insignificant. They are in the east wing of the part surrounding the Court of St. Damasus, and the windows of his rooms can be seen over the colonnade from the Piazza di San Pietro. He thus, though to a certain extent the prisoner he has been called, can overlook the whole of the city that once was the capitol of the Church's temporal kingdom.

Viewed from a certain standpoint, the Vatican may be called a history in stone of the rise, the decline, and the temporal fall of the Roman Catholic Church. Originally built when days of martyrdom for Christians were not far behind, it was three hundred years after that it was the scene of the greatest height of the Pope's power, — the crowning of the emperor of the world by the Pontiff of the Church. A thousand years after that the same office was demanded of his successor by the man whose ambitions seemed about to make him the veritable ruler of all Europe. Since then, the museums and galleries of this mighty pile have indeed grown in extent. But the priceless paintings and tapestries within have undergone the inevitable spoliation of that time aided by zealous restorers. No longer at the Vatican is held the dazzling court that rivalled the splendours of fabulous Eastern monarchs. No longer the sceptre of him whom policy must keep close within its limits can claim unquestioned obedience from the greatest of the kingdoms of the world. It does not require abnormal imagination to feel in the dead palace itself the infinite changes the years have brought. In the extreme quiet that pervades all its vastness, in the subdued, noiseless, almost furtive air of its custodians, in the away-from-the-world effect of the whole place, there are numberless hints of the different days that have descended upon it. But most of all in the blackened, dulled, or villainously rebrightened frescoes that make its chief treasures, does the change appear in all its glaringness. One can dream what were the glories of the Sistine Chapel under Leo X.; one can guess how the Pinturicchio golden stucco-studded ceilings gleamed under Alexander VI.; one can imagine the Stanze of Raphael in all their freshness and clarity; but, like the temporal power of the most ancient hierarchy of Christendom, these things can be actually seen no more. Perhaps it is an artistic heresy to suggest that to him of vivid poetic imagination these art works of the great Renaissance have after all in some ways gained by the ravages of the years. Surely, he who studies them with the sympathetic appreciation of their possibilities ever before him hardly needs to see them as they were fresh from their creator's brush. Perhaps, even, he builds from what he feels are wrecks of one time perfection, a glorious whole more wonderful than could ever come from the painter's palette. For though time destroys, it casts a glamour over the past that recreates in even lovelier forms the ruins it has made. So, in looking back at the history in which this palace of the Popes bore so large a share, the days of its splendour and omnipotence linger long after the wars and pestilence, the bloodshed, the crime, the immorality that made it the very centre of their rioting course, have been forgotten.

There are various opinions as to the actual founding of the original Vatican palace. The Emperor Constantine and St. Sylvester have both been credited with its inception. The probability seems to be that somewhere about 500 A. D. Pope Symmachus built near the ancient basilica of St. Peter's an episcopal residence. This was the Pope who appealed to Theodoric to confirm his election, there being on the field at the time a rival, Lawrence, who claimed the papal chair. Not till Symmachus's successor came to the pontifical throne did the wars and bloodshed caused by his accession cease. Gregorovius states that, having in spite of Lawrence and his adherents kept the seat, in gratitude for being spared to what was perhaps not a blameless life, Symmachus built and adorned many churches, as well as founded the Episcopia on the right and left of the stairway of St. Peter's. Before long this had increased to a number of different, if connected, buildings, for various churchly purposes. There were cardinals' apartments, presumably some sort of treasury or counting-house, a dwelling for strangers and Church dignitaries who were passing through Rome, and perhaps even some kind of school or exercise rooms for novices in the priestly ranks. The name, Vatican, belonged really to the whole region about. "Mons Vaticanus" is said to be derived from Vatinis, — oracles. And it is stated that the ancients used to receive prophecy from certain oracles there living or officiating. This Mons Vaticanus was not one of the seven hills of Rome, but was quite outside the walls. It was here where Caligula had his gardens, and it was here that Nero built the circus where hundreds of Christians were put to frightful deaths. According to Roman Catholic teaching also, the crucifixion of St. Peter took place not far from where is now his tomb in the cathedral. Thus hallowed by the blood of saints and martyrs, it followed almost as a matter of course that the greatest of the Christian cathedrals should rise from the ground so full of sacred memories. After that, though the heads of the ever-widening church had their palace as far away as the Lateran, the very needs of the basilica demanded some sort of royal abode near by. So the Vatican grew, till, by the time of Pope Stephen II., there were already chapels, oratories, mausoleums, a pontifical palace, the presbytery, dwellings for canons and choristers, convents and monasteries. Stephen II. made additions to the palace, and less than fifty years later it had grown to such proportions and magnificence that Charlemagne spent the winter of 800 under its roof. It was at the end of this, his third visit to the city, that the Pope crowned him Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire. In three hundred years the Popes' power had mightily advanced. Symmachus had appealed to Theodoric to confirm his own election. Leo III. claimed and exercised the right to confer the greatest temporal title of the world upon this conquering Frankish king. Almost from this time till the return of the Popes from Avignon, the Vatican, like the rest of Rome, was the scene of never-ending bombardment, plague, pillage, fire, and misery. In 846, the whole of the city was devastated by Saracens, and St. Peter's and all the surrounding buildings left in nearly total ruins. Up to now, this quarter had been, as in the ancient days, outside the city walls. Consequently it was quite at the mercy of any foes who chose to attack it. Leo IV. put an end to such untrammelled invasions. Under his orders a heavy protecting wall was raised, encircling the whole region. The name of the Leonine city has ever since been associated with the enclosure. In Raphael's Incendio del Borgo, he glorifies the miracle said to have been performed by this pontiff. The wall of Leo IV. still exists in part, and one of its towers serves for a summer-room for Pope Leo XIII. This is a large, round chamber, with a half-spherical ceiling painted with the symbolical figures of the constellations. One of these, the lion, has two stars for eyes, which, by some system of lighting, shine and sparkle all through the night. The walls are so thick and impenetrable that, while the city is boiling under the pitiless August sun, here is a coolness like a tomb.

After Leo IV., internal and external wars ravaged the city of Rome with little pause. One long line of battle and siege after another raged, contesting now the supremacy of the Popes, now the ancient rights of the senate and people of Rome, now championing the attempts of neighbouring towns, anon establishing the absolute reign of the German sovereigns. Whatever the cause, the Popes were invariably on one side or the other, till by the beginning of the fourteenth century, for very fear of life and possessions, they abandoned their ancient throne and took their court to Avignon. Up to this time the Lateran had always been the chief residence of the Popes. Occasionally, however, when hard pressed by enemies, they had been forced to take up their abode in the Vatican, that being better fortified. Eugenius III. fled here for awhile, and to him are ascribed some of the foundations of the present palace. Celestine III., in spite of the troublous days, made further additions and extended the fortifications. It was by now practically nothing but a barricaded fortress, and as such was subject to attacks and sieges. By the twelfth century it was in an almost ruined condition. Innocent III., who for awhile lived there, built more walls and towers to protect it, and is said to have employed the Florentine architects, Fra Sista and Ristori, to aid him in his plans. To Innocent IV. are due the Gardens of the Vatican. An inscription, says Pérate, that was preserved up to the last century in the garden of Pius IV. related in detail the laying out of these. Nicholas III., in 1277, also lived at the Vatican, and his additions are supposed to have occupied the site of the Borgia Tower. Boniface VIII. died here at the beginning of the fourteenth century. Kept a prisoner there by the Orsini, who believed him insane, it is more probable that it was grief and rage over the triumph of his old enemies the Colonna, which drove him to his unhappy end.

During the thousand years of papal residence in Rome, invasion and bloodshed often enough had scourged the city of the Cæsars. The seventy years following the transfer of the head of the Roman Church to Avignon witnessed such a devastation as can hardly be conceived. Castles, palaces, churches, houses, whole streets lay demolished in the dust. Cattle were grazing in the Lateran and St. Peter's. All kinds of government had practically ceased. In 1347 Cola di Rienzo declared that the Eternal City was more like a den of thieves than the abode of civilised man. All who could get away had fled from the scene of desolation. It has been stated that at the time of Urban V. there were scarcely five hundred people left within the broken walls. Amid the wreckage of two epochs — pagan and Christian — Rome seemed no longer to exist.

For many hundreds of years the Lateran was the official palace of the Popes. When Urban V. was finally persuaded to come to Rome, this palace was too ruinous for habitation. The Vatican, being better fortified and protected by its nearness to Castle St. Angelo, was in somewhat better condition. Before the Pope left Avignon, he sent orders ahead for the Vatican to be made as livable as possible. In spite of hurried restorations and renovations the bare, half-ruined pile must have looked desolate indeed to this prince of the Church used to the royal magnificence of Avignon. The corps of artists he brought with him, among whom were Giotto, Giovanni, and Angelo Gaddi, could have made little impression upon the hapless heaps. It is hardly surprising that he did not stay long. Even St. Bridget's woful prophecy could not keep him from the waiting ease and joys of the Church's adopted capital. History states that his chief desire to return to Avignon was to be near the protection of the French king. He could there better wreak his revenge upon Charles IV., Emperor of Germany, who had manifested an independent spirit galling to the pontiff. But there is little doubt that the luxuries and culture of the city near the Rhone had something to do with his decision. Rome, the den of thieves, as Rienzo styled it, could offer nothing that was attractive or stimulating. The Vatican palace itself, gaunt, gloomy, ill-supplied with even fourteenth century comforts, must have been a daily contrast to the kingly splendour in the halls at Avignon.

But St. Bridget's prophecy came true. Urban was taken sick the very day of his arrival at Avignon, and died nineteen days after. Meanwhile Rome, and indeed a large part of the Italian peninsula, had grown more and more indignant that the head of the Church should no longer be in the city of its birth. The demands became so vigorous and imperative that Gregory XI., Urban's successor, at length decided to give in to the popular clamour, and returned to the Holy City. Wars and internal disturbances prevented him from doing much in the way of embellishment of church or palace. At his death the magistrates locked the conclave into the Vatican to select his successor. Outside the walls the Roman populace thronged, yelling with threatening cries that unless an Italian were chosen the whole assembly of cardinals should be put to instant death. And while the uneasy priests were debating, a fearful storm arose that bellowed and boomed through the shaking halls and extinguished all the lights. The black darkness was only broken by sharp lightning flashes, and in one of them the cardinals saw drawn up under the rafters a determined body of soldiers. In consternation they delayed no longer. Bartholomew Prignano of Naples was proclaimed Urban VI. But this was the beginning of schism and worse disorders. There was no peace or safety for the Popes in Rome. In spite of one and sometimes two rival pontiffs in different parts of the world, the Romans continued to elect their own man. They were forced, however, to flee from one city to another, pursued by enemies both within and without the Church. While Innocent VII. was Pope, Ladislas of Naples seized the Vatican, and the Pope escaped to Viterbo. Later, in 1413, the Neapolitans again triumphed, and then there began such a sack as recalled the days of the Vandals. Finally the end of the schism was the election of the Roman, Otto Colonna, who took the title of Martin V. Before him Alexander XXIII. had built the covered way to the castle of St. Angelo, thus giving an outlet to safety for many a future Pope.

Once more the whole of the city was a fearful ruin. There were soldiers in St. Peter's, and wolves in the deserted gardens of the Vatican. Martin V. set to work with enthusiasm, and, while he built churches and monasteries and streets, he made only enough repairs in the Vatican to keep the walls standing. It was in too hopeless a condition for residence, and he lived in a palace near the Church of Saints and Apostles. From his day on the Vatican became the principal palace of the Popes. As such it was the centre of that power that was ever striving to grasp the world. No history has yet told the secrets its walls have known. It might almost be said that from Martin V. to the time of the French Revolution no event in the history of the time but was known and to a certain extent influenced by the mighty court assembled there.

Fearful wrongs as well as unquestioned virtues have paraded unafraid beneath the shadow of its protection. Humanity in all its journeys from heights near the angels to depths below all devilhood has passed unhindered through its doors. With Martin V. the first signs of the Renaissance appeared in Rome. In art, Rome was far behind the other Italian cities. Not only did she produce none of the great artists that were already beginning to be known beyond her borders, but she woke up to their importance only after others were claiming their work. Eugenius IV. continued the efforts of Martin V. He succeeded in inducing Fra Angelico to come to decorate a chapel he had built in the Vatican. Before it was accomplished — or probably even begun — he died, and it was left to his successor, Nicholas V., to inaugurate with all its possibilities the Renaissance that was already making Italy the queen of the world.

Nicholas V. had vast schemes. Books and art were a passion with him, and he planned to decorate his capital till it should be the envy of Christendom. Almost immediately he began to carry out his designs for the rebuilding of the Vatican palace. To accomplish these designs it is practically certain that he tore down what parts of the old building were still left standing. Some of the foundations he doubtless retained, and Eugenius's chapel became his own oratory. It was his idea to keep a plain, almost severe outside, the better to emphasise the richness, elaboration, and luxury within. It was to be something of citadel shape, recalling by its walls and towers the palace of Avignon. A triumphal door would lead into the courts full of rare trees and fountains, about which were grouped the buildings. There was a beautiful theatre, whose round arch was supported by columns of marble. At the right were the hall of the conclaves and the coronation, with two smaller halls and the apostolic treasury. Below this the immense Gallery of the Benediction opened its windows toward the Castle of St. Angelo. Upon the left a large chapel with arched roof, which may be said to be the Sistine, was entered by a vestibule. In mounting toward the extremity of the palace, one entered a large building of the library, lighted by windows on two sides. A little beyond was another court, and then the kitchens and stables. The apartments of the Pope and the apostolic rooms looked upon the first court. Pératé quotes Manetti as saying that the ground floor was used in summer, that above in winter, and the next for spring and autumn. The plan for this is said to be that of Alberti. Before these immense designs had begun to be realised in wood and masonry, Nicholas died. The only parts of the present palace unquestionably his are the buildings immediately surrounding the Court of the Papagallo, including the Borgia wing. Behind the loggie of Bramante, the stanze, which Raphael afterward painted, served as the apartments of Nicholas. These were first decorated with works at least ordered during his life. Buonfigli da Perugia, one of the masters of Perugino, Bartolommeo da Foligno, Simone di Viterbe, Andrea del Castagno, and Piero della Francesca, were among the artists employed. Francesca's works were once where now one sees the Miracle of Bolsena. They were historical compositions full of contemporaneous portraits, among which were Charles VII. of France, Cardinal Bessarion, Prince of Palermo, and Nicholas Fortebraccio. Higher than all other artists in the favour of the Pope stood Fra Angelico. By some miracle of oversight or unexpected discrimination the exquisite paintings in the studio of Nicholas are still intact, a joy for all beholders even to the present day.

Besides with the work of architect and painter, Nicholas V. filled his palace with exquisite stained glass, with rare marbles, wonderful illuminations, embroidery, and sculptures. He sent to Venice and Florence and still farther afield for every kind of art product that would help to make his palace the most beautiful in the world. He practically founded the Vatican library, and his court became famous for the historians, poets, engineers, architects, painters, sculptors, and writers that filled his audience halls. Flemish tapestry had already excited much admiration by its brilliant colouring, and Nicholas established the first school of Roman tapestry weavers in the palace itself, under the direction of the Frenchman, Reginald de Maincourt.

After his death Calixtus III. began an entirely different régime. Poets, and painters, architects, and engineers, were no longer in demand. All work toward the completion of the Vatican was stopped. Calixtus did not hesitate to follow to the letter his conviction that the regal appurtenances of his predecessor were so many wiles of the Prince of Darkness, entirely out of character for him who was the successor of the fisherman apostle.

Pius II. had no such ascetic views as to the rights and privileges of the See of Rome. He built a tower which commanded a door of entrance to the Vatican, and completed some of the unfinished rooms of Nicholas V.

His successor, Paul II., was accused of being a mere "commercial" by the literati of his day. His principal desire was to conquer the Mussulmans. In waging war against them he had little time left to carry on the artistic schemes of Nicholas V. At the Vatican, however, he built a façade of three stories which, though it had disappeared by the time of Paul V., served as model for Bramante for his noble Court of St. Damasus.

By 1470 the Renaissance could show such names as Brunelleschi, San Gallo, Ghiberti, Donatello, Verrocchio, Pollajuolo, Della Robbia, Rossellino, Mino da Fiesole, Masolino, Masaccio, Castagno, Melozzo da Forlì, Gentile Fabriano, Benozzo Gozzoli, and Fra Lippo Lippi. It was not the capital of the Christian world, however, that knew them best, or most encouraged their works. Since Nicholas V. Rome had fallen far behind Florence or Siena or even minor towns in all advancement of art.

Sixtus IV. came to the papal throne in 1471, and with him begins a new era. If Rome could not produce native artists, at least she could adopt those of more fortunate regions. So intensely interested was Sixtus IV. in this art advancement that he has been said to occupy to the development of the Renaissance in Rome a position similar to that of Lorenzo de' Medici in Florence. At the Vatican he continued the work of rebuilding and restoring, following largely the plan of Nicholas V. The palace at this date was an irregular quadrilateral triangle, inclosing the Court of the Papagallo and joining by the Loggie of the Benediction with the vestibule of St. Peter's. This, the ground floor of the principal building, was below the rooms which make the Borgia apartments. They were under the Raphael rooms, where Sixtus IV. had his library. Contemporary accounts state the architectural works of this pontiff to be of considerable extent and beauty, and they praise the magnificence of their decorations. Melozzo da Forli was the head of a school of painters whom Sixtus IV. had persuaded to come to Rome, and it was to him the Pope gave the decoration of his library. That part of the Vatican most intimately associated with Sixtus IV. is the Sistine Chapel. This was finished even to its side frescoes during his pontificate, and has ever since borne its founder's name.

It was during the pontificate of Innocent VIII. that Granada was finally wrested from the Moors, and it was near the end of his life that Columbus set out on his great journey. If he did not continue in quite the lavish way of his predecessor, at least he left substantial additions to the papal palace. His part of the building is more or less mixed up with the constructions of Paul II., and there have been many discussions what to ascribe to each. It seems probable, however, that the large division of the building where the door of the palace connects with the Loggie of the Benediction, belongs to the time of Paul II. This is where he put his arms. Innocent VIII. restored the door, and continued the large façade by an edifice which makes a right angle, overlooking on one side the Square of St. Peter's, and on the other the court of entrance of the palace. This façade, which was after the style of the Palace of St. Mark, was of much inferior beauty to the Loggie of the Benediction. It, as well as the great hall which Innocent VIII. finished, was destroyed to make place for the new St. Peter's in 1610.

What does remain as a monument to Innocent VIII. is the Villa Belvedere. This is probably almost wholly of his pontificate. At that time it was built for a summer home, and was some distance from the palace. Vasari and others have given Polajuolo as his architect. Müntz says, however, that trustworthy documents ascribe it to Jacopo da Pietrasanta. It is said to have cost sixty thousand ducats. Mantegna did most of the interior decorations. A story is told that the Pope, often being behindhand with Mantegna's just pay, the artist determined to teach him a lesson. So the Pope one day found him at work upon a figure whose meaning he could not guess.

"Who is she?" he asked, curiously.

"That," replied Mantegna, with covert emphasis, "is Economy, your Holiness."

"Ah!" answered Innocent, "then paint next to her Patience, Mantegna." But it is said that after this the artist's money was promptly ready.

His works here, as well as his frescoes in a chapel of the Vatican, have all perished. Gone, too, are the floors in the Belvedere that were made of tiles from the workshop of the Della Robbia.

It was in this Belvedere that Alexander VI. kept prisoner Catherine Sforza, ex-sovereign of Forlì, and it was in one of the rooms of the Borgia apartments that he himself died a terrible death, a death generally believed to have been caused by the poison he had meant for another.

Apologists for Alexander VI. lay great stress upon his patronage of the arts, many of them, like Müntz, claiming that posterity actually owes him a debt of gratitude for the encouragement he gave to the genius of Bramante, San Gallo, Perugino, Pinturicchio, Caradosso, Michelangelo. There is no doubt that he seized with avidity upon any artist who was capable of adding to the external glory of a reign almost unparalleled for its outward magnificence. But indeed all Italy was fairly throbbing with the joy of her awakening from the long sleep of art. Princes, potentates, and even merchants vied with one another in their efforts to secure the services of new stars in the firmament of sculptors, painters, and architects. In those eager days any real talent was most unlikely to die neglected. It would have been extraordinary if the luxury-loving Pope, he whose very vices required the richest of accessories, had not followed in the lead of the nobles of Florence, Venice, Milan, and Verona. And after all is said, Alexander VI. completed and added to the works of his predecessors rather than created new. At the Vatican the only part wholly of his era is the Borgia Tower. The so-called Appartamenta Borgia belongs to Nicholas V. Under Alexander it was merely finished and decorated. And though the Pinturicchio frescoes are among the priceless treasures of the palace, yet, as has been truly said, too much of such style of decoration would have ended in the death of painting. The Oriental voluptuousness of the Pope showed itself in the excesses he demanded in gold, ornament, and scintillating colour. A little of such bravura of embroidery is permissible even in highest art. Beyond this, it becomes merely cloying and degenerate.

Under Julius II., nephew of Sixtus IV., began the greatest period in the history of the Vatican. To him and to his follower, Leo X., are due the larger part of the marvellous works of art that to-day still make the Vatican palace the most wonderful museum in the world. It was Julius II. who commanded Bramante to join the palace to the Belvedere, who ordered Michelangelo to paint the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel, and who set Raphael at work on the Stanze.

Bramante's plan for making the Belvedere a part of the Vatican proper was simple, dignified, and rational. If it had been allowed to remain as he designed it, the mass of buildings under the one name would be so much the gainer in coherency and charm. He threw out two long, parallel galleries joining the Villa at one end, the Vatican at the other. These two powerful lines were three stories high, each story an arcade whose columns and pillars circled the immense court that to-day is cut by the Library and Museum.

Julius II. at first lived in the Borgia Apartment. Tiring, likely enough, of for ever seeing the image of his predecessor, he decided to move into the story above, which had been the part used by Nicholas V. These rooms, decorated by artists of the earlier Renaissance, he ruthlessly ordered entirely refrescoed. Of all the works he saved only the little Chapel of Fra Angelico, where, each morning, he celebrated his mass. By 1508 a whole colony of painters was installed in the venerable apartment. Signorelli, Perugino, Sodoma, Bramantino, Peruzzi, Lorenzo Lotto, and the Flemish Jean Ruysch were hard at work covering walls and ceiling. Then, suddenly, Raphael, who was working by Perugino's side, stepped into fame at one bound. All the others were dismissed, and to him alone was confided the whole work.

Not till the very end of the fifteenth century did a passion for the antique begin to be felt in Rome. In Florence the Medicean collection of ancient sculptures were in existence long before any such effort was made in the city of the Church. Sixtus IV. did open a museum of antique bronzes, and Innocent VIII. added some newly found works in brass and a colossal head of Commodus. From then till Julius II. no attempt was made to increase these relics of the past. While Julius was still cardinal he came into possession of a recently discovered Apollo, and when he became Pope he had it put into the Cortile di Belvedere. This court, about one hundred feet square, was laid out as a garden with orange-trees and running streams. Bramante designed semicircular niches for the statues that from then on were placed there. It was the beginning of the famous sculpture gallery that so excited Napoleon's admiration and greed.

Leo X. added to the sculptures in the Vatican Garden, and went on with the great plans of Julius II. for the beautifying of the palace. Among other constant demands upon Raphael he ordered him to make cartoons for tapestry which was to be hung around the walls of the Sistine Chapel below the paintings. Raphael also built on to the Bramante loggie a third story above the two already completed, and made the façade to the old pontifical palace.

Into the midst of all these wonder-works of art, despoiling the hard-won triumphs of generations, overturning, breaking, ruining precious gems no

after efforts could replace, came the destroyer from the north. Under Fründesberg and De Bourbon, the Germans and the Spaniards descended upon Rome with the fury of the Vandals of old. The Pope, Clement VII., was forced to flee to St. Angelo with his cardinals, prelates, and household, and there for seven long months he watched the destruction of his city. Houses were razed, churches and convents stripped of vases and vestments; relics, tiaras, chasubles, tabernacles, chalices ornamented by the great artists of the fifteenth century, tapestries, pictures, sculptures, manuscripts, — all were broken, torn, dispersed. Nobles, civilians, artists, poets, and scholars fled from the burning, rioting town, and Rome knew once more the desolation she had escaped since the days of the return of Gregory XI. The Vatican suffered equally with the other palaces. In the Borgia apartments open camp-fires of the barbarians smoked and blackened beyond recognition the golden dreams of Pinturicchio. Every treasure that could be melted or smashed or by any means converted into a commercial value was like kindling-wood to the flames of their greed. After that they wantonly ruined all that could be made of no monetary value. Spears, javelins, sabres were thrown at the frescoed walls, till many of them had scarcely a foot unscarred. The costly stained glass windows, the pride of Sixtus IV., were shattered to millions of glistening splinters. Statues were overthrown and broken, the gardens despoiled, — the whole place turned into a wreck that might be rebuilt but could never be the same. Everything considered, it is only remarkable that the very stones of the foundation were preserved. Conquering, invading armies even of twentieth century civilisation do not pretend to preserve for their victims' future use the treasures that come within their triumphal march. In the invasion of 1527 there was a spirit beneath that would have regarded any clemency as sacrilegious. The Protestant Germans under Fründesberg considered the smashing of images, the ransacking of churches, the tearing of priestly vestments, and the razing of convent and monastery as part of their religious duty. They felt to the elaborate paraphernalia of the Roman Church much as the early Christians did to the stone and marble gods and temples of the heathens. In each case the loss to art has been the same.

When finally Clement VII. was released and the Imperial army withdrawn, like a true Medici he at once set about the renovating and reornamenting of his palace. Giulio Romano, a pupil of Raphael, was ordered to finish the stanze Raphael had begun, and Del Vaga and Da Udine were set at work in the Borgia Tower. Finally, Michelangelo was commissioned to paint the Last Judgment in the Sistine Chapel. In the Pauline Chapel, the Conversion of St. Paul and Crucifixion of St. Peter were also finished during the latter's pontificate. Though the Pope was sixty-five and Michelangelo sixty, so great was the ardour of both that all Rome began to feel as if she were back in the days of Julius II. Antonio San Gallo restored the Court of the Belvedere, commenced by Bramante, and of which one whole gallery had tumbled down. He also constructed the entrance of the Sistine Chapel, and Sala Regia, an enormous vestibule with dome in the centre whose two stained glass windows were by Pastorino da Siena. This vestibule, where he wrote the names of the Farnese and Paul III., took the place of very ancient chambers of the palace, part of it being the oratory of the Holy Sacrament, decorated by Angelico for Nicholas V. As Pératé emphatically says, there can be no excuse for the self-aggrandisement that effaced these souvenirs of bygone times. The same Pope who destroyed this chapel of Nicholas V. blazoned his name upon the door of the Pauline Chapel, a chapel whose richness was only equalled by its banality.

For Julius III. Michelangelo designed a beautiful flight of steps for the Belvedere, in the shape of a quadrangular staircase with a balustrade of peperino marble. By this time the master was getting old, and although his advice was consulted for whatever alteration or addition was made to the Vatican, fresco painting had got beyond his failing physical powers. One can imagine his disgust when, unable himself to paint, his great fresco of the Last Judgment was ruthlessly altered to suit the prudery of the time. Paul IV. either felt or was persuaded that much that had been sanctioned under the name of art was mere blatant indecency. Accordingly he started in on his crusade against immorality by commanding that the nude figures in the great fresco should be properly clothed. Red and green and blue and brown robes and capes and scarfs were therefore carefully painted over the undraped angels and saints and martyrs and fiends. The fact that this conscientious veiling of the "human form divine" was bound to alter the lines of the composition, and greatly to change the distribution of the colour-mass, influenced this encourager of reforms not at all.

While Pius IV. was Pope, the great Court of the Belvedere was finished after the plans of Bramante under the superintendence of Michelangelo. Alongside of the Sala Regia were added two other rooms with a vault feebly arched over an arcade. It was decorated with a fresco of landscape alternating with figures of the virtues, the vaulting ornamented with fine arabesques.

Since the death of Leo V. the third story of the loggie had remained untouched. This was now decorated with stucco and fresco by Da Udine and Pomarancio. But the most charming achievement of Pius IV. was the erection of a summer-house in the gardens about the palace. This, built by Piero Ligorio, was called the Villa Pia. It was a wonderfully happy architectural invention, abounding in all the grace of the antique. In form it was an ingenious joining of two small houses by a circular court of marble. Placed in the groves of pines and aloes, with flower beds tier upon tier, fountains and marble basins and covered galleries, with the walls ornamented with bas-reliefs and paintings by Baroccio, Santo de Tito, and others, nothing was lacking to make this exquisite creation a veritable artist's dream. Built at the very end of the Renaissance, it breathes a delicate fragrance like a last tender bloom upon a dying branch.

Gregory XIII., in whose time came the reform of the calendar, added the Torre dei Venti to the Vatican, and founded its gallery of geographical charts. He also finished the second arm of the loggie on the north of the Court of St. Damasus. In the palace a whole army of painters was at labour. Federigo Zuccherro worked on the vaulting of the Pauline Chapel, and with Vasari finished the frescoes of the Sala Regia. These represent the great pontifical deeds from the Carolingian donations to the Battle of Lepanto, the triumph of which Rome had celebrated with the pomp of ancient days. Pomarancio the younger imitated on the first floor of the new loggie the decoration of Giovanni da Udine. On the second floor Sabatini and Tempesta attempted and failed to reproduce the style of Raphael in the series of little frescoes illustrating the life of Christ. The rooms opening into this gallery are the apartments given to foreign potentates, and they as well as a chapel dedicated to St. Paul and Anthony are all overdecorated. Landscapes, Biblical scenes, life of St. Gregory the Great, figures of Virtues, crowd and jostle one another almost, it would seem, without plan. Truly the Renaissance is dead. The third floor continues the ornamentation begun under Pius IV. on the first floor. These are scenes of the life of Pius IV. and Gregory XIII., and all along the ceiling is the solemn procession transporting the body of St. Gregory from the St. Mary of the Campo Marzo to St. Peter's. These loggie lead into an immense gallery of one hundred and twenty metres, constructed in 1581 by Muziano, and enriched by stucco and paintings under the direction of Tempesta.

Romans felt, when Sixtus V. became Pope, as if the Renaissance were beginning to live again. Fontana, who was his chief architect, had worked with pupils of Michelangelo, and the Pope kept him busy altering and making additions to his palace. He closed the Court of St. Damasus toward the east by a third body of building where the continuation of the Loggie of Bramante made a new palace.

Henceforth this was the habitation of the Popes. It is extraordinarily large, more open and more healthy than the old rooms of Nicholas V. and of Julius II. Fontana made it of bricks, the window-cases and the cornices of travertin. He gave it the form of a rectangle, a little elongated, bounding an interior court and growing about the base of the massive tower of Nicholas V.

Not less important but more questionable in taste was the creation of the Vatican library, which vast edifice, cutting across the Court of the Belvedere, interrupted the gracious lines of Bramante's designs. Commenced during the winter of 1587, it was almost entirely finished by the autumn of the following year, and it cost a thousand crowns of gold. In 1590 the windows were provided with glass, and the superb central gallery, divided into nine naves by the pilasters of stucco, received a most elaborate decoration. These frescoes, more precious for their history than for their art, are accompanied by Latin inscriptions which tell most ingeniously of all the works of Sixtus V.

Clement VIII., he who condemned Beatrice Cenci to death, completed the palace of Sixtus V. by a third story, where to-day are the apartments of the Cardinal Secretary of State. A mediocre painter, Giovanni Alberti, covered the walls with gigantic frescoes which represented the baptism of Constantine, the death and glorification of St. Clement. Clement VIII. also ordered the completion of the library of Sixtus V.

VATICAN LIBRARY

Urban VIII. added to this library a new division, expressly to receive the Palatine collection which had been bequeathed to it. In an effort also to reestablish the pontifical army, which since the sixteenth century had amounted to little, he formed an arsenal in the Vatican, placing it over the library.

In 1660 Bernini, in constructing his imposing colonnade to the cathedral, changed the entrance to the Vatican, making it as one sees it to-day. Of the old door there remain the "portoni di bronzo," which Innocent VIII. had put in place and which Paul V. had restored. Passing the ever-present Swiss Guards, one comes to the Royal Staircase. This majestic entrance-way has a beautiful roof of caissons, supporting the Ionic columns, and mounts slowly and harmoniously to the Sala Regia. Bernini, as has been often said, in his inexhaustible fertility of invention, has perhaps never achieved a more expressive decoration.

During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the Popes assiduously collected all the antique sculptures they could find to enrich the Vatican, and to ornament the public squares of Rome. The Gardens of the Belvedere had been changed into the Museo Pio-Clementino, which was fast being filled with innumerable bas-reliefs and inscriptions. The actual founder of the Vatican Museum in its present form is Clement XIV., and his work was finished by his successor, Pius VI., under the guidance of the architect Simonetti. It meant the entire remodelling of the old villa of Innocent VIII.

Hardly had Pius got his treasures safely and beautifully housed when, after the invasion of the Italian states by the French, the treaty of Tolentino gave the gems of the collection to Napoleon. When Pius VI. died in exile at Valence, the marbles of his palace were in the Louvre in Paris. Despoiled of all the more wonderful of the art treasures of his capital, Pius VII. started bravely to replace them, if not in value, at least in extent and number. It was during his years that Canova produced his once extravagantly admired figures, poorly enough, in reality, taking the place of the antique fragments.

The lapidary of Pius VII. extended from the first floor of the Loggie of Bramante to the sill of the library of Sixtus V. Its walls were ornamented with antique inscriptions, and bordered by sarcophagi and all sorts of broken bits. After that began the Museo Chiaramonti, where the statues, farther than eye can see, line the walls. Almost all are too much restored, and the majority of them are only of inferior artistic value. But meanwhile explorations in Rome and the Campagna were constantly bringing new works to sight. To give them a fitting place, Pius VII. had Raphael Stern construct, in 1821, a long, rectangular room, called the Braccio Nuovo. This was parallel to the library of Sixtus V., and over the same principal court of the Belvedere. The Pope bought everything he could lay his hands upon, and in 1818 had already brought to the Vatican the celebrated antique fresco of the Marriage of the Aldobrandines, discovered during the pontificate of Clement VIII., near the Arch of Gallier. In 1819 he formed the Egyptian Museum, with the collection of a Roman amateur, Andrea Guidi.

And then, finally, after Waterloo, in 1815, the Louvre in its turn had to disgorge, and back came the treasures Napoleon a score of years before had sent in triumph to the city on the Seine. The Vatican gained by the transfer more than she had lost, in spite of the fact that France managed to retain a few minor sculptures. For Pius VII. took from the returned spoils of war enough canvases that once had hung in Italian churches to start a picture-gallery in his palace. They were placed in the building of Gregory XIII., in the third story of the loggie.

This brings us almost to the Vatican as it exists to-day. In 1836, Gregory XVI. created the Etruscan Museum in twelve small rooms, and in 1858 Pius IX. added to the chambers of Raphael the room of the Immaculate Conception, decorated in fresco by Francesco Podesti. Pius IX., as well, opened the old balustrade giving access to the Court of St. Damasus by a large covered stairway of travertine and white marble and stucco. His orders repaired with marble and glass the magnificent staircase leading with its three hundred steps to the palace of Sixtus V., and under his direction Alessandro Mantovani repaired the paintings of Da Udine and Pomarancio on the first floor of the loggie. They also decorated the wing of Sixtus V. with landscapes and Christian allegories.

In 1870 the temporal power of the Popes no longer existed. Only in the Vatican was that power still omnipotent. If now Italy had the great painters and sculptors of the Renaissance, one can imagine that every means would be employed to secure their ablest efforts for this last remnant of the might that once claimed the world's obeisance. Even with the inadequate talent at his command, Leo XIII. has done much to prove his artistic right to be the successor of the Popes of days for them more fortunate. He has opened new rooms in the library and archives. He has ornamented the Gallery of the Candelabra with a rich pavement of marble, and a ceiling where are painted in allegories the acts of his pontificate. His greatest claim to the gratitude of all art-lovers is his restoration and opening to the public the apartments of the Borgia.

Perhaps, when the to-be-hoped-far-away future has crumbled to ruins the Stanze and the Sistine Chapel, perhaps the soil of Italy will have ready a new race of giant creators, who can worthily replace the masterpieces of the vanished past. Meanwhile, for us, the embers of that golden era still glow with a brilliancy that dims all present achievement. Only one of many museums where are garnered the art treasures of the world, it is the Vatican which holds more completely than any other worthy examples of the greatest art-epochs of all times.

CHAPTER II.

CHAPEL OF NICHOLAS V.

THERE is little of the atmosphere of the outside world anywhere in the Vatican Palace. Yet the quiet that pervades the galleries, museums, and chapels in this home of the Popes, seems noise compared with the still solemnity of the small room once the studio and now called the Chapel of Nicholas V. So thoroughly do the paintings of that monk who worked only for the glory of God dominate both the room and those who enter it.

After more than a decade spent in the Convent of San Marco, Angelico da Fiesole, called lovingly Fra Angelico, was summoned to Rome by Eugenius IV. In the spring of 1447, when Eugenius had been dead some months, the frate began his labours in the Vatican. The painting of the study of Nicholas was preceded by his decoration of the Chapel of St. Peter, a building between the basilica and the palace, and which was destroyed less than a century afterward to give place to the great staircase of the palace. The frescoes thus destroyed contained portraits of Nicholas V., St. Antonio, and Biondo of Forli.

Upon three walls of the vaulted study of the Pope he painted the histories of St. Stephen and St. Lawrence. The St. Stephen series fill the upper lunette-shaped portions of each wall. They picture his Ordination, his Distribution of Alms, his Preaching, his Defence before the Council, his Expulsion from the City, his Death by Stoning. The lower part of each wall has a scene or scenes from the life of St. Lawrence, corresponding in subject to those above: his Ordination, the Pope Bestowing upon him the Treasures of the Church, his Distribution of these Treasures, his Appearance before Decius, Conversion of his Jailer, and his Martyrdom.

These frescoes, painted when Fra Angelico was already an old man, show nothing of the weakness of age. Instead they are a grand culmination of a life that, using art only to express the joys and solace of religion, nevertheless advanced steadily and triumphantly to complete artistic expression. The most splendid are the St. Stephen Preaching, Martyrdom of St. Stephen, Ordination of St. Lawrence, St. Lawrence Giving Alms, and St. Lawrence before the Emperor Decius.

St. Stephen Preaching shows the saint on a low step that apparently leads to some building near the city wall. Before him, a company of women sit listening to his words, while behind them stand a number of men, as deeply interested. The Gothic architecture of the background may possibly be attributed to Benozzo Gozzoli, a pupil of Fra Angelico. There are, in this composition, twenty-two or twenty-three figures. And each and every one, it is not too much to say, has a life, an individuality, an expressiveness scarcely ever before to be found in paintings of the early quattrocento. The saint himself, as he stands before his listeners, has a solidity, a roundness, a reality that might be credited to that great creator of solid, firmly built human forms, Masaccio. But he has as well the grace and charm and spirit that Masaccio never acquired. These were Fra Angelico's birthright. This, too, like the rest of the frescoes, abounds in realistic touches. St. Stephen, gazing intently and with great persuasion at his audience, has grasped his left thumb between the forefinger and thumb of his right hand; a gesture as natural as it is telling, in marking off the points of his discourse. In the women seated on the ground there are innumerable indications of the study Fra Angelico was constantly making from living models. Though they are all dressed very much alike, the position of their hands, the expression of their faces, are as different as if a modern painter were representing them. There is, perhaps, a slight sameness in their features. Yet this does not make them less individual. While all are deeply engrossed, they show their attention in varying ways and degrees. One woman has her hands crossed on her breast, while she gazes at the saint with her head thrown back, as if she were drinking from the very fount of the Most High. Beside her another has her hands clasped, while with even eyes she follows the words, her whole manner evidence that each sentence is fraught with deep personal application. Farther front, nearly in full face, is one, her hands on her lap, her eyes level, looking out of the picture instead of at the preacher. She listens with veneration but with the calmly quiescent spirit of one who already knows and appreciates the Scriptural pleadings she hears. One of the most remarkable faces is that of an older, more closely draped woman, somewhat behind the last mentioned. Only her head and shoulders can be seen. But the dark-eyed face hints of trouble and suffering, and she listens to the words as if her soul was longing for the help she is sure must come. The men in the rear are no less striking in delineation. There is more difference in facial expression, and their attitudes are full of change and action. The two men on the left who stand talking together are especially noteworthy. One is evidently expounding some precept of the saint, while the other, wrapped closely in his robe, turns his bearded face in eager attention.

The Martyrdom of St. Stephen fills the other half of the lunette that shows him thrust out from the city. The two scenes are separated by the curving wall of the city with its towers and battlements that recede into the distance against the hills of the background. The figures of the latter division are not up to the best work in the chapel. The characterisation of the faces is still penetrating and distinctive, but there is less happy placing, and the forms are thicker and clumsier, and show less intimate knowledge of construction. On the other side, however, the painter-priest returns to his higher level. At the extreme right St. Stephen kneels in prayer, apparently unconscious of the stones hurled against him, or of the streams of blood that are trickling down his face and neck. As always with Fra Angelico's saints, his halo is well defined, like a round disc, against which his face comes sharply in profile. Behind him are two of his slayers, one, an old man who, holding his garment away from his feet with his left hand, is about to hurl a rock with his other. His hairy face expresses implacable revenge and fanatic rage, and his figure is tense with the concentrated passion of the moment. In front of him a younger, equally vigorous figure, has just discharged one of the stones that is crashing against the martyr's head. Back of these two stand the Pharisees, sternly relentless, conscientiously vindictive. Prominent is St. Paul, who holds some of the garments of the slayers. No figure by Masaccio ever stood more firmly upon the ground or showed keener sense of what Berenson names "the tactile values." In almost all the frescoes of the chapel, it appears quite possible to walk around these well-constructed figures. They are no mere shells pasted against a background. They stand upon firm foundations, and behind them is a real distance, with ample room between. The figure of St. Paul has these attributes in a marked degree. The painter, too, has portrayed him so well that it is easy to see how that sturdy, uncompromising personality became afterward the fervid, compelling apostle.

Next to the St. Stephen Preaching comes the scene before the Council of Jerusalem. The judge in white on the throne-like bench is splendidly conceived; the folds of his ample mantle have the dignity of the antique.

In the Ordination of St. Stephen, Peter is bending over the kneeling saint before six disciples. The nave and transept of the church in the distance are excellent in proportion, and of a good style. Until very late in his artistic career, Fra Angelico had paid little attention to perspective, — painting with a flatness like the Japanese or early Byzantines. Here he turns away from all this and gets effects of distance and proportion as accurately as if he had always been striving for them. Time and restoring have greatly injured both St. Stephen's Expulsion and his Martyrdom.

St. Stephen Giving Alms is pathetic and lovely in the extreme. Standing on the steps of his church, he slips a piece of money into the hands of a young mother. She is draped in flowing robes that accentuate her graceful femininity. A clerk is behind the saint and near the mother is an older woman entranced in prayer. Others press forward for their share of the charity, and at the right two women depart and commune with each other. Fra Angelico here, as in the companion to this, St. Lawrence Distributing Alms, succeeded in showing poverty and frailty without arousing dislike or shrinking in the spectator's mind. He emphasises instead the joy of giving and the thankfulness of the receiver, and fills the picture with a tender feeling for helplessness that does not obscure the excellent pictorial effects of the composition.

In the Ordination of St. Lawrence by Sixtus II., which is much damaged, the Pope, with the tiara, is seated in a basilica of a late classic style. Before him kneels the young deacon, to whom he is handing the patten and chalice. Seven or eight ecclesiastics surround them. One bears a book, another a censer, another an incense boat. But they are of slight character and generally uninteresting. It is upon the Pope and the kneeling saint that the painter has spent his chief efforts. The grave old man and the eager young priest are worthy of closest study. Here, too, as in the St. Stephen, the Pope is a portrait of Nicholas V.

The panel of St. Lawrence Receiving the Treasures of the Church has a complicated but correct architectural background. The two soldiers at the door are realistically portrayed and full of action, if slightly twisted in construction.

It is in the mate to this, however, St. Lawrence Giving Alms, that Fra Angelico's power is at its height. Standing in front of the nave of a basilica, the saint is surrounded by a pleading, importunate, but cheerful crowd of beggars. In spite of infirmities and needs of all description, they express in every line their confident belief in the generosity of the giver. The mother holding the child close in her arms might almost be the model for one of Fra Angelico's Madonnas. Like one of his saints, too, is the old man with the long beard, who is bending forward and leaning on his cane, while he claims his share. Two little children, one of whom already has his gift, are clasping arms in great content, the childlike naïveté of their expressions being no less true to childhood than to Fra Angelico's art. The architectural background is exact in its lines of perspective, and the delicate ornaments of the pilasters and capitals are exquisitely indicated. On the whole, this may be called the most remarkable of all of Fra Angelico's works. He shows in it his enthusiastic study of the antique, his no less earnest consideration of the human form, and at the same time his own deep spiritual power, and that delight he took in making his religious ecstasies intelligible to his day. It is indeed the culmination of much of the best art of the early quattrocento.

In the St. Lawrence before Decius, he has the most florid of all his architectural accessories. The emperor is seated upon a throne in an apse-like recess, on either side of which are two pilasters with Corinthian capitals. The entablature over the arch runs along on the same level over a wall flanking the canopy on each side, this wall also divided by Corinthian pilasters placed at even distances. In front of it a rich brocade hangs loosely, and above, on each side of the attic of the canopy is a large flat bowl full of flowers. In Decius, who sits upon his throne "for all the world a king," is a certain sense of aloofness. His eyes are downcast and do not look at St. Lawrence, who faces his accusers squarely. All about are the populace, drawn with much variety of detail and attitude. The head of Decius was undoubtedly copied from a Roman bust.

The Martyrdom of St. Lawrence is greatly injured, but the figures are clearly differentiated and strongly expressive.

Throughout the series the colour has of course undergone the usual vicissitudes. Many portions have been repainted, more have suffered from dampness and corrosion. In spite of everything, however, there is still much of the simple brilliant tones Fra Angelico loved so well, and that gave to his heavenly scenes a lightness and freshness unexcelled by any other master of his time.

Between the lower series of frescoes, on the pilasters, are painted saints, standing in niches. These are SS. Anastatius, Leo, Thomas Aquinas, Ambrose, Buonaventura, Augustine, John, Chrysostom, and Pope Gregory the Great. Of them the Buonaventura is the most celebrated. The slender, ascetic hands, clasping the open book, are as full of character as is the benignant head, with its kindly introspective eyes, its firm, generous mouth, its flowing, forked beard. It is probable that the painter-monk was making a portrait of some dear friend, so sympathetic and intimate is the treatment.

In the vaulting are the four Evangelists with their symbols, against an azure golden-starred sky. St.

Matthew has his book and pen, and an exquisite little angel with clasped hands is standing beside him.

St. Luke, whose wide forehead is widened by his lack of hair, also has a book and pen, and near him kneels the ox. The face is wonderfully expressive of the physician side of the apostle.

St. John is shown with the eagle, his face not strongly unlike Buonaventura.

St. Mark appears with his lion watching by his side, while the apostle with bent head and eyes busily writes in the volume on his knee.

To quote the American editors of Vasari's "Lives," "The scenes in the lives of Stephen and Lawrence in this chapel . . . do not suffer greatly even in their close juxtaposition with the Stanze of Raphael." In this nearness they "are like the plein chant of the mediæval Church beside the chorded melodies of Palestrina." ". . . Consider the very early epoch of Fra Angelico, and that he was well known even before Masaccio began the frescoes of the Carmine, and it must be admitted that here, in spite of his self-imposed limitations, was one of the greatest masters of the Renaissance."

CHAPTER III.

THE BORGIA APARTMENTS

THE Appartamenti Borgia of the Vatican are directly under the Stanze of Raphael. These rooms, so elaborately decorated by Pinturicchio for the Borgian pontiff, were deserted by Julius II., and for four hundred years were allowed to fall into neglect. In 1816, after the return of the papal treasures by France, they were taken for the picture-gallery. The light was so bad, however, that the paintings had to be removed, and the suite was then made into a miscellaneous museum and library. In 1891 Leo XIII. began their restoration. By that time the plaster in many places had been cracked and destroyed, and during the time of Pius VII. a varnish was applied to parts of the ceiling, which made a kind of crust. The restoration, carried out under the direction of Signor Lodovico Seitz, was confined to repairing the plaster and stucco, and to cleaning the frescoes from dust and damp. In some parts of the fifth and sixth halls, stucco has been taken from the walls, and the walls then reconstructed and the surface "refixed." But it has been done so exquisitely that no mark is observable, and fortunately retouching, with some trifling exceptions, has not been allowed. What repairing there is dates from the time of Pius VII. This, of course, so far as the actual panel paintings are concerned. The purely decorative part, especially of the lower walls, was in such bad condition that it had to be completely renovated. When possible the fragmentary remains were closely followed, and if they were wholly lacking appropriate hangings have taken their place. These minor decorations form a tremendous study in themselves, and are particularly interesting because it is so apparent that the artist superintended every bit of the work, ordering the marble mantels and cornices, the wainscoting, and even the porcelain flooring to suit his colour plan. The rooms were reopened to the public in March, 1897.

Ehrle and Stevenson in their splendid volume show very clearly that it is only with the second of the Borgia apartments that Pinturicchio's work commenced. The rooms occupied by Alexander VI. for living purposes were the Hall of Mysteries, the Hall of Saints, that of Arts and Sciences, and the two "withdrawing" rooms. There were thus five rooms which probably took Pinturicchio about three years to finish. His superintendence is evident in every one. Undoubtedly he had assistants, and many of them, but his vigilance must have made him nearly omnipresent. His oversight was so careful that nowhere is there any break. They are his own, not only in design and placing, but largely in actual execution. Probably the marble work is by Andrea Bregno, who was with Pinturicchio in the Sistine Chapel.

The glowing yet subdued beauty of the rooms is like a brilliant flower bed seen through a filmy haze, the colours swimming and melting and absorbing one another till there is a bloom that, rich, resplendent, is far removed from even a suggestion of garishness. The chambers are square, not very high, and slightly vaulted. It was in the Hall of Arts that the first husband of Lucrezia was murdered. In the next the Pope died in terrible anguish.

The first room, the Hall of the Pontiffs, which Ehrle and Stevenson claim was never painted by Pinturicchio, was at any rate entirely redecorated in the time of Leo X. by Perino del Vaga and Giovanni da Udine. Though the scheme of the ornamentation leads easily into the following rooms, it is much inferior to them. In the vaulting are frescoes of the constellations, with a heavy stucco work there as well as on the walls. The tapestries below represent the myth of Cephalus and Procris.

In the Hall of the Mysteries, the first of the Pinturicchio series, are seven principal paintings in the lunettes made by the lines of the vaulting: the Annunciation, the Nativity, the Adoration, the Resurrection, the Ascension, the Descent of the Holy Spirit, and the Assumption of the Virgin. All these are simple in the extreme, of a peaceful, poetic character, with the figures drawn on the quiet, conventional lines suited to the demands of the Church of that early date.

The Annunciation is considered to be wholly by Pinturicchio. In a stately hall of rich ornamentation, Mary is kneeling on a tessellated floor, a vase of roses between her and the angel carrying the lily branch. Through the central, imposing, triple archway, an attractive Umbrian landscape is seen. Above, in the sky, the Eternal, surrounded by cherubs, sends the dove of his Spirit to the kneeling maiden below. The colour is as charming and restful as the drawing is simple and graceful, the sentiment reverently religious. The angel's robes are a rose-pink, Mary's an exquisite combination of peacock blues and greens. There is over the whole a delicate suffusion of colour as fascinating as it is softly luminous. Here as everywhere, parts of the composition are picked out in gilded stucco, that, after the toning of hundreds of years no longer obtrudes or overaccentuates.

In the Nativity, the Virgin and Child are certainly by Pinturicchio himself, though there is evidence of pupils' work elsewhere in the picture. The baby Christ lies in the centre foreground on a cloth thrown over a bunch of hay or straw. At some distance kneel Mary and Joseph, in adoration. Projecting from one side are the pillars and thatched roof of the stable, over the wicker manger of which an ass and a cow look out with wise, questioning eyes. Slightly back of Joseph two charming angels are also kneeling, and above in the golden starred sky are other angelic messengers, three of them grouped together holding a scroll. The landscape is similar to the one of the Annunciation, with trees and roadways, hills and distant castles.

Schmarson attributes the Adoration of the Magi to a Lombard, with the exception of the boy standing on the extreme right at his horse's head. He is thought to show the hand of a pupil of Botticelli. Mary, tender and sweet-faced, sits on the porch of a building that, though tumbling into ruins, still retains elaborately carved pillars and arches and cornices. At her side stands Joseph, leaning on his staff, and in front are the Eastern kings, with their numerous followers. There is some careful study of the faces of these old and young men, but both in the drapery and in the build of the figures beneath there is much less knowledge displayed than in the best of Pinturicchio's work. The landscape is again Umbrian, sharp hills in the distance and a mass of ruins in the foreground. In the sky two angels fill the upper part of the lunette, rather too fully perhaps. The child, standing on Mary's knee, is unusually poorly constructed and modelled.

The magnificent figure of the Pope kneeling at the left of the open tomb in the Resurrection is what saves that fresco from intense archaism. Though the guards in armour opposite him are full of spirit, they are angular in construction and of laboured foreshortening. Christ, in mid-air over the tomb, stands on a cloud, an elliptical golden glory completely encircling him. This glory is of golden stucco of innumerable round spots, over which raised golden flames are played. His right breast, shoulder, and arm are uncovered by the voluminous drapery that leaves his left leg from the knee down fully exposed. He is imperfectly conceived and weakly drawn. Far and away from the knowledge and authority of the hand that painted the Pope. This pontiff is so entirely draped by his magnificent brocaded jewel-bordered robe that only his head and hands are free. Even his short neck is nearly swallowed from sight by the heavy collar. Yet the figure beneath this swathing is almost as clearly felt as if Michelangelo himself had painted it. Not an unnecessary fold is there, either, in the gorgeous papal costume as it hangs straight from the thick shoulders. It is in the face and hands, however, that the artist reveals himself as a portrait painter of high rank. The face is in direct profile, — a position that shows as little as may be the fat cheeks and extra layers of flesh running from cheeks and chin to neck. But a square full face would not more truly have given the character of this Borgian pontiff. An insufficient, sloping forehead, full eyes, too close to the nose, which is large and with a high Roman arch to it, long upper lip over a heavy lower one, a chin that leads by one diagonal line without a curve into the wide, short neck, a most abnormal development of the lower back part of head and neck, — these are the salient points of this portrayal which can be no caricature. For it must have pleased the Pope, or it would not have remained on the walls, and perforce it must have done him full credit. The hands with their smooth taper fingers would be nearly ideally perfect, if the flesh had not made them puffy. Not the kind of hands likely to be found on a strong, noble man, but of charming line and colour for a — soulless dilettante perhaps.

In the arch above the window is the Ascension. Here once more is the Christ with the flame-raised glory behind him in very similar position to that of the Resurrection. It is also an equally weak, ill-drawn figure, and indeed the whole scene lacks the fresh spontaneity of many of the others. Around Christ in the sky is a border of cherubs, with still more beyond. Of the two angels who are kneeling beside the Redeemer, the one on the right with slashed sleeves and robe is especially lovely, showing a charming feeling in the praising hands and the fair, downcast face. Below this heavenly division is an expanse of sea bordered with fields, pompon-foliaged trees, and hills, and castles. Here are Mary and the apostles. Some of the younger heads remind one of Botticelli, especially the one in the background on the right. There is considerable attempt at characterisation, but they do not make at all homogeneous groups. The colouring in this, as in all, is restful in its blues and greens, enlivened without being sharpened too strongly with the gold.

The Descent of the Holy Spirit has suffered much from the damp and restoration. The scene is in an open field, with background similar to the landscapes of the other spaces. In the clouds above, surrounded with golden rays and a dozen or more cherub heads, is the dove with outspread wings. Below, with Mary kneeling in the centre facing the spectator, are the disciples again. If possible, they are even less successful than in the Ascension.

The last one of the large frescoes of the room is the Assumption, and it is a rarely beautiful work. There are certain parts which recall Perugino, but it is probably by Pinturicchio's own hand. Above the open, rose-filled tomb, Mary is being borne heavenwards. She is sitting with prayer-laid hands in the centre of the usual elliptical, golden glory, bordered with cherubs. Over her head two graceful angels hold a crown and the pendant jewelled ribbons. Below these, with their feet resting on clouds, are four angel musicians. One plays a guitar or mandolin, one a violin, one the triangle, and the fourth the tambourine. Their positions and draperies are as effective as some of Raphael's own conceptions. On the left of the tomb is a saint with aureole, the face turned up till it is strongly foreshortened. The excellent drawing of the hands, the full, heavily folded drapery with its narrow golden edges, the intent, earnest expression, and the feeling for bone and muscle in the whole figure make this a very remarkable accomplishment. Even stronger and more vigorous is the black-robed man facing him. In its sharp delineation and unflattering truth it is evidently a portrait. It is splendidly modelled, firmly and knowingly constructed. This with the Pope is enough to mark Pinturicchio as a really great portrait painter.

In the vaulting of the room are eight medallions with figures of prophets. These are surrounded with lines and squares of ornament made of arabesques, curves, and scrolls, with everywhere the conventionalised bull and the arms of Alexander VI. It is a wonderfully beautiful and harmonious effect of exquisite tone, the blues and greens and chocolate shades almost dissolving into the gold. The bull, so frequently appearing, was a device belonging to the Borgia family from the thirteenth century.

A marble doorway with a lunette above, in which two delightful putti bear a shield, leads to the Hall of Saints. There the decoration is much more ornate, inventive, and imaginative than in the preceding chamber, and in the paintings there is far more action, better grouping, more poetic feeling, and lovelier colour. The principal frescoes, besides the legends of the saints, are scenes from the Old and New Testament.

Over the door is Susannah and the Elders. In the centre of the lunette a boy holding a dolphin is perched on the top of a fanciful fountain enclosed in a little rose-bordered garden. Within the plot are various animals, — a stag, hares, a monkey on a gold chain, a doe. In front, a little to the left, stand Susannah and the two elders. Her position is that of the Venus of Milo, reversed. With her white clinging garments that fall in unbroken, simple folds, she is as lovely a creation as can be imagined. Quiet, reposeful, though an elder grabs her furiously by each arm, she is entirely unafraid and unexcited. The modelling of her face and arms and hands is fine, soft, and delicate, her figure is beautifully drawn, her face winsome. The two elders are executed with energy, and are full of character. Beyond, on the left, the maiden is again seen, hurried to execution by guards in fifteenth century costume, while slightly behind her Daniel prances up on a white steed to intervene in her behalf. On the other side the elders, bound to a tree, are being stoned to death. Even a small child is throwing with all his might as big rocks as he can handle. The landscape is painted with a fascinating minuteness, that, though making each part in itself enchanting, has spoiled the coherence of it as a whole.

The next panel to this represents St. Barbara's escape from the tower where her father has confined her. The tower itself, not altogether a happy piece architecturally, occupies the centre of the picture, and displays on its side the big break that furnished the way of escape for the young saint. At the left, with her fair hair and draperies flying, St. Barbara, calling upon Heaven for help, has just fled through the opening. Her father, with scimiter in hand, is hunting for her in the wrong direction on the other side, while of the two guards behind him, one apparently sees the fugitive, and is glad of her release. In the distance, her hand clasped in her protector's, Santa Giulia, the young saint has got beyond her pursuers. Opposite again, the father is interrogating a shepherd, and this unfortunate, evidently confessing to having seen her, is turned in consequence into marble. To convey the idea he is painted all white. The landscape background adds to the naïve gaiety of the picture. The bright colours and charmingly flowered foreground, the delicate, dainty saint, give an unreal, fairy-like effect to the whole scene.

Facing this is the lunette holding the visit of St. Anthony to Paul the hermit. It is one of the most successful of this highly successful set. In front of a tall, rocky, natural archway, the two saints are breaking the loaf which the raven has brought. Behind the hermit are two disciples in white robes, and behind St. Anthony three demon women. They are extravagantly dressed, but, except for their bat-like wings, horns sprouting from their towering head-dresses, and claws instead of feet, they might be merely fashionable women of the world. The last of the three, with head thrown back and hands pressed against her waist, is really a lovely figure, with a piquant, childlike face. St. Anthony is scrupulously drawn, his robes splendidly handled. The hermit and disciples seem to show the brush of a pupil.

The Visitation has a delicate, pervasive charm that is hard, perhaps, to localise or fully explain, yet which is the very heart of the picture. Florid, light architectural forms, open arches and loggie above, fill up a large part of the space. In front, clasping hands, stand Mary and Elizabeth, the younger's head and eyes down, Elizabeth gazing at her with the intent, piercing look that all the old painters give her. They are dressed in the conventional blue and green robes, and each is capitally drawn and modelled. The calm, peaceful dignity of Mary is especially well indicated. At her side Joseph leans upon a staff, and behind him appears a train of children and pages. The other half of the composition carries the most charming group of all. Zacharias, backing up against one of the pillars, is reading, oblivious to all that is taking place before him. Under the arches a number of maidens and elderly women sit spinning and embroidering, while behind, a girl holds a distaff, and a child plays with a dog in the foreground. The figures are well drawn and grouped, and they all have that soft, restful beauty that seems particularly "Pinturichiesque." The gradations in the landscape, the softened colours of the distance, combine to make this one of the most satisfactory of the sequence. Here, as in every room, the light is so bad that it is very difficult to get any good view of the frescoes.

It is particularly hard to see the Martyrdom of St. Sebastian, which in some ways is the most vigorous and displays the most knowledge of all. Strapped with his hands behind him to a pillar in the centre of the big lunette over the window, is Sebastian. His head and eyes are lifted upward, and he seems to see the angel who, in the sky, brings him hope and comfort. The solidity and excellent modelling of forms of this nearly nude figure are almost unexpected from the hand of such a quattrocentist as Pinturicchio. On either side the archers are shooting or stringing their bows, all in leisurely unemotional attitudes, suggesting, as has been said, a jovial shooting-match rather than an execution. One archer on the right stands with his bow resting on the ground, his eyes turned to the sky, perhaps to indicate regret for his part in the tortures. All the figures are spirited, one of the best being the archer back to on the left who is just about to let an arrow fly. The landscape proves that Pinturicchio studied the Roman surroundings. In the distance is the Colosseum, to the right a church, and in front a broken marble column. It was the first time that any artist attempted to render the sad beauty of the Roman landscape.

The principal wall of this room has the finest of all Pinturicchio's works. It is called the Dispute of St. Catherine, and shows her in an outdoor court before the Emperor Maximian and fifty philosophers, to whom she declares her beliefs with a serenity and poise unequalled. The centre of the lunette is taken by the Arch of Constantine, crowned by a golden bull. In front of this are the doctors and philosophers and princes and their retinues, pages, and children, and the emperor on his richly ornamented throne. Here Pinturicchio's fancy has revelled with a joyous abandon, a riotous floridity that yet never becomes meretricious. Robes are heavily embossed and embroidered, and edged with gold, trappings of horse are jewel-studded, the ground is covered with delicate, starry flowers, the very trees are blossom-laden. The emperor sits in untroubled judicial attitude on his throne at the left, with a crowd of courtiers behind him. Directly in front is the slender, youthful, beautiful Catherine, the rest of the great assemblage filling nearly the whole of the remaining space of the lunette. Some are searching their books, some are instructing their pages to look for certain notes, some are merely listening to the young saint's discourse, while others are discussing among themselves. Of all the young and old, children, horses, and dogs, St. Catherine is the only woman in the whole congregation. Straight, willowy, undismayed, robed in a magnificent brocaded gown, her long, fair hair hanging to her waist, she is marking the points on her fingers. There are many portraits among the crowd; in fact, it is probable that a large part of the heads are representations of what were well-known personages. At the extreme right is one of the most noticeable figures of all, a Turk on a white charger. He is so much in the foreground that he and his steed almost dominate the scene by their size and brilliancy. The horse, splendidly modelled, the gorgeous saddle-cloth, golden-studded harness, and the extraordinarily heavy, gold-stuccoed dress of the rider, all combine to make the two of startling prominence. He is supposed to represent Prince Djem, son of Sultan Mohammed II. Catherine is thought to be a portrait of Lucrezia Borgia, the famous daughter of Alexander VI., whose beauty has been extolled as noisily as her crimes. If this looks at all as she did then, when she was about fifteen, there certainly was nothing to indicate in face or figure the wickedness with which she was afterward charged.

The ceiling of this room is as worthy of careful study as the more prominent wall frescoes. Unfortunately, besides the necessity for either standing on one's head or constantly using a mirror to see these vaulting decorations, the light is so bad that to obtain any adequate idea of them is extremely difficult. Divided by the framing bars are eight large, triangular spaces, in which are scenes illustrating the myth of Isis and Osiris, which, because of the history it contains of the deification of the bull, was undoubtedly chosen to symbolise the exaltation of the house of Borgia. The whole ceiling is a maze of golden stucco work intermingled with the paintings, even the separating bars being marvels of intricate decoration. The first of the divisions devoted to King Osiris shows him ploughing with bulls, and teaching the Egyptians to plant orchards and vineyards; then comes his marriage to Isis; in the following the warriors throw their unused armour into a corner, while a fat putto is astride a swan, — this last undoubtedly copied from a recently discovered antique; the wicked brother persuades the Egyptians to mutiny; farther on poor Isis finds the scattered legs and arms and body of her murdered husband; next comes his burial; after that a pyramid is erected to him; finally his apparition is deified in the form of the bull Apis; and the history ends in a procession, with the bull borne in triumph.

The whole room is an entrancing vision. It appears that certain parts of the execution, especially in the smaller designs, were left to Pinturicchio's assistants. But he undoubtedly was the originator of the designs, and his presence as supervisor is more strongly marked all through this room than in the Hall of the Mysteries. It is of all the suite his masterpiece.

A round medallion of the Mother and Child is over the doorway leading into the Hall of Arts and Sciences. The Madonna, with her clear eyes, delicate mouth, and rather long nose, was evidently studied from life. She is apparently the one whom Vasari calls a portrait of Giulia Farnese, the Pope's mistress. But his claim that Alexander VI. was kneeling in adoration before her seems to be without foundation, for no third person was ever painted within the circle. The child is daintily constructed, dressed in a tunic to his knees, intent upon his book. Altogether it is a lovely group, and adds to the long list of triumphs for Pinturicchio. The background is gold, and the borders of the robes and even the high lights are of the shining colour.

The ceiling of the Hall of the Arts and Sciences is more conventionally mechanical in design, but is extremely soft and harmonious in its spacing and colouring. A great central octagon fills a large part of the vaulting, most of the remaining portions being taken by two triangular divisions on each side. What is left is given over to borders and panels of ornament, in which grotesques are sparingly used. Every part is treated minutely, and is full of rich, conventional designs, yet each keeps its place in the general scheme. In the centre of the octagon are the arms of the Borgia bordered by radiating sun rays. Everywhere the sign of the family, the bull, appears. The wide architrave has octagonal medallions joined by oblong ones representing the virtue of justice and other sacred and legendary scenes.

They have been so badly hurt by damp and restoration that there is little left of their original state. In fact, the whole of this room has suffered more from time than any of the others. Some of the scenes have been almost wholly and very badly repainted.

Each of the seven principal panels on the walls contains a woman on a high architectural-backed throne. About the base are the disciples of the art or science which the throned woman personifies. Beyond is a softly tinted landscape, with a blue and gold embossed sky. These calm, thoughtful, contemplative beings are far removed from the world. They are the very spirit of the art or science they typify.

Rhetoric is a graceful, youthful figure, holding a sword in one hand and a globe in the other. These same emblems are in the hands of two stocky little putti on each side of the platform on which her feet rest. Above, two other putti hold the drapery over the top of the throne. Three men stand on the left and right, one of whom on the left may be meant for Cicero. There are traces of Perugino's style in this painting, and it is very possible that Pinturicchio took some of the figures from drawings he had received from Perugino. Rhetoric is unusually lovely, with soft hair falling away from her face, and with a bright look in her questioning eyes. The drapery, too, is well massed.

Geometry sits more nearly full face, holding her square and compass. There are no putti in this lunette, and their place is taken at the foot of the throne by the bald-headed Euclid, dressed in red, drawing a diagram. In the extreme left corner is a figure, which is probably a portrait of Pinturicchio. Several of the disciples about Geometry's throne show pupils' rather than Pinturicchio's hand.

The loveliest of all these personified arts and sciences, perhaps, is Arithmetic. She has a certain weary air, and a pensive wistfulness about her long, delicate face that somehow add to its attractiveness. In the turn of her neck and head she is reminiscent of Botticelli's figures, but there is much less strain of muscle and much less of that painter's anæmic look. The transparent veil half covers the hair that falls over a beautiful gold-embroidered robe, hanging in softly indicated folds. The figures standing near the throne are vividly drawn, and their robes are as carefully painted as their faces. Here are the colours Pinturicchio so delighted in, the rich pinks, dull blues, and soft greens. Here also is a real attempt at massing the light and shade.

Another delightful creation is Music, though with not quite the delicate bloom of Arithmetic. She is playing upon a violin, her lids drooped, a soft, introspective smile upon her lips. Her head-dress, with the knots of thin drapery over her ears, recall Botticelli again, and perhaps even more strongly, Perugino. There are four charming putti in this group, two standing on the steps at her feet playing flutes, while two above hold up the rich green drapery. Tubal-cain, forging musical instruments, and two other old men are on the right, while on the left are seen three joyous boys, one playing a harp, one a lute, and one singing. Through all these groups are a charming spontaneity and unity, and one feels a gaiety and pleasure in them, as in few other paintings of the quattrocento.

Astrology is badly damaged. The restorations make it practically impossible to tell what was Pinturicchio's part in it, but it seems doubtful if any of it was worthy of him. The four putti who hold wands with the signs of heavenly bodies on their tips are too heavy and clumsy for the charming babies he could paint so well. Equally unhappy are the groups on each side who, separated from the principal figure by the rocky landscape, have no connection with the scene in which they were placed.

Grammar and Dialectics are also both badly modernised. The period of this flagrant retouching, judging from the dragon by the side of the central octagon, and which is probably the crest of the Buoncompagni, was therefore in the pontificate of Gregory XIII.

Between Rhetoric and Geometry the Borgia

scutcheon, surmounted by the keys and tiara, is set in a stucco frame, supported by three full-length angels. The grace and freedom of their figures, the rhythmic lines of their flying draperies, and the excellent drawing make this as beautifully perfect and decorative a group as there is in the whole set of rooms.

The next two chambers, which are alike in architecture, are those called the "withdrawing rooms." They are far more simple in decoration than the others.

The first has a ceiling of geometrical designs and grotesques, below which is a frieze of twelve half-length figures, two by two, of apostles and prophets. Each prophet holds a scroll with a prophetic saying, and the apostles carry one with a sentence of the creed upon it. A mediæval legend credited to each apostle one sentence of the creed, and each is here supposed to hold the one originated by him.

In the second room sibyls are paired with prophets, each pair surrounded with ribbons upon which are written the early prophecies of the Church, concerning the birth of the Redeemer. These ribbons are treated in a decorative way to fill up the spaces, and were traditional with painters of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries.

The figures in these two rooms are much restored, and, compared with the earlier ones, stiff and archaic.

A few of them, however, have the Pinturicchian head-dress and gestures, as well as certain lines and folds of the drapery characteristic of him. Zacharias has a noble face with heavy tumbled hair, and is not an unworthy predecessor of the mighty ones of the Sistine Chapel. Though these halls are not up to the grand scale of the others, they show a coherency and a harmony that make them an integral part of the whole. In the window recesses of the Hall of the Creed are marvellous decorative schemes, where fishes, masks, fauns, cupids, flowers, and musical instruments are mixed and mingled and twisted, with astonishing ingenuity. It was in the Borgia apartments where were first used the grotesques and fanciful borders afterward so extensively and masterfully employed by Raphael in the loggie.

In these rooms, the triumph of Pinturicchio, in spite of all the limitations and defects of his art, he shows "a self-restraint and a feeling for effect which are unerring, he hits upon the exact size, and keeps the composition exactly within the picture, and at the right distance from the eye." They "are a rich yet unobtrusive setting, they do not compel your attention, but only give the impression of a refined splendour of surrounding, of a marvellous insight into beautiful harmony of colour. The effect of the light has been so nicely calculated that even when freshly executed, the walls would not have been overbrilliant for the brilliant scenes to which they formed the background." "Everywhere we are aware of the vigilant and sensitive grasp of the master's hand upon his tools, and allowing for all shortcomings of detail, we cannot but feel that here we have an enviable monument for a painter to leave behind him."

In the Stanze one is in the presence of an art that is clear, sane, and gloriously happy, full of the spirit of life itself. The Sistine breathes a very different atmosphere. Grand, majestic, awe-inspiring, telling of the life of the soul in the travails of a weary world, are the messages that come to us here. Neither of the world of flesh, of mind, nor yet of soul, the frescoes of the Borgia rooms exhale a delicate, evanescent perfume that comes straight from the realms of phantasy, full of the glimmer of will-o'-the-wisps and dancing fireflies, from the over- or under-world of elves and sprites and fairies, of genii and dancing loves.

CHAPTER IV.

THE SISTINE CHAPEL

JACOPO PONTELLI, a Florentine, has generally been credited with being the architect of the Sistine Chapel, built about 1473. Müntz, however, brings forward some late discovered documents from the archives of the Vatican that seem to show that not Pontelli but Giovanni de Dolci was responsible for the edifice. Whoever the builder, the constructional lines of this world-renowned chapel are not in themselves beautiful or scientifically exact. The vaulting is irregular, the lighting insufficient, and the general proportions insignificant. The decorations alone are what have made this small sanctuary one of the greatest of the world's treasure-boxes. Described literally, it is a barn-like, slightly vaulted room less than one hundred and fifty feet long, and not quite fifty feet wide. On each side are six round-arched windows, directly beneath the spring of the vaulting. Below these, separated by painted pilasters, are the side frescoes executed during the pontificate of Sixtus IV. From a cornice running along the walls below are painted imitations of heavy hangings, the space once covered by Raphael's tapestries.

The twelve side frescoes are of unequal merit, differing schemes of composition, and once must have been of strongly varying colour. Time, ungracious to them individually, has treated them well considered as a decorative whole. The general effect of these twelve works of the quattrocento is lofty and surprisingly harmonious. The colours have so faded and blended that now, in their dull blues and grays and greens, they make a wonderfully appropriate and sufficiently unobtrusive setting to the majestic ceiling above.

Besides these twelve panels there are two on the entrance wall, and originally there were as well three by Perugino at the altar end. For the two opposite the altar slight consideration is required. One by Cecchino Salviati represents Michael victorious over Satan, bearing away the body of Moses. The other is the Resurrection by Domenico Ghirlandajo. They were badly disfigured by the sinking of the architrave, and were afterward wretchedly repainted. Above the line of frescoes between the windows and along the southern end at the same height, Botticelli and his assistants painted the figures of twenty-eight Popes. These, though doubtless more or less restored, are practically as they were four hundred years ago and are the least interesting part of the whole decorative scheme.

The subjects of the wall frescoes on the left are taken from the life of Moses, and "have a typical reference to the corresponding representations" on the right, illustrating the life of Christ. Beginning from the altar, the order is as follows:

Left.

1. Moses and Zipporah on the Way to Egypt. Attributed to Signorelli, now thought to be by Pinturicchio.
2. Moses Overcoming the Egyptians and Driving away the Shepherds from the well. Botticelli.
3. Moses and Israelites after the Passage of the Red Sea. Cosimo Rosselli.
4. Moses giving the Commandments from the Mount. C. Rosselli.
5. Punishment of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. Botticelli.
6. Moses Giving Commands to Joshua. Attributed to Signorelli. Probably by Pinturicchio.

Right.

1. Baptism of Christ. Attributed to Perugino, probably work of Pinturicchio.
2. Christ's Temptation. Botticelli.
3. Calling of Various Apostles, from Lake of Genesareth. Domenico Ghirlandajo.
4. Christ Preaching on the Mount. C. Rosselli.
5. Christ Giving the Keys to Peter. Perugino.
6. Last Supper. C. Rosselli.

According to Vasari, it was Botticelli to whom Sixtus IV. gave charge of the artists at work in the Sistine Chapel. His three frescoes there show him at his worst and in even greater measure at his best. In the one nearest the altar, Moses overcomes the Egyptian and drives away the shepherds who would prevent the daughters of Jethro from drawing water. Here is the crowding of incident into one composition so usual with most of the painters of the quattrocento. It has no common centre, although there is a distinct middle scene. At a well, Moses pours water from the bucket into a trough for the sheep, while the daughters of Jethro stand by looking on. Behind this the Patriarch is seen driving away the shepherds who had troubled the maidens. On the right of the central scene, Moses, with a sword held high, again appears, standing over the Egyptian whom he has felled. On the steps of a classic building at the side, the Israelite, wounded by the Egyptian, sinks into the arms of a woman. Behind this portico Moses flees from the wrath of Pharaoh. Again in the foreground on the left of the well he leads his company of Israelites out of Egypt. Back of this incident he is seen kneeling before the Burning Bush, within which the figure of the Eternal appears. To the right of that, among the sheep of Jethro, he removes his shoes on the slope of one of the hills that help to outline the background. A bunch of trees, rising from behind the well and beyond, springs up to the top of the fresco and assists in drawing the multitude of scenes into something approaching unity. Regarded from the standpoint of true composition, this is not one, but many pictures. Yet it is worth remembering that any attempt for centralisation of composition was not natural to artists of this day. Botticelli made no effort to produce what Raphael instinctively accomplished, a well massed and balanced picture. His desire, as well, probably, as the command from the Pope, was to represent as many incidents in one panel as possible, in order that the story of Moses might the more perfectly be told. Considering his aim, he has really brought together the various moments depicted with a good deal of skill. The worst thing about it is the lack of perspective between the figures of the foreground and those of the background. These latter are of course inordinately large. When the separate groups are studied, many of Botticelli's most delightful, characteristic attributes are discovered. In the scene about the well he shows a grace, an idyllic spirit, that is remarkably quiet and serene for a man so often expressing in his works the intensity of subjective emotion. The procession of Israelites is no less full of dignity and simple movement, with individualistic treatment of the various members. Moses, with his calm gravity, Aaron intent and serious, the loving mother with her unhappy child, the pathetic little boy carrying his pet dog in his arms, — all are expressive to an intense degree. The colour of the picture is mostly in gray and white, emphasised by the white sheep, the white robes of the maidens, and the gray-white shades of the buildings, the walls, and the roadways. Moses, in the background, is dressed in yellow; in other places his robe is an olive green over a dull yellow. There are many more blues than reds in the fresco, and the sky is a deep indigo, growing white near the edge of the distant blue hills. The foliage of the oak-trees (the device of Sixtus IV.) and most of the landscape are a dark green.

Farther on along the same side comes the Punishment of the False Priests. In the foreground, at the right, Moses, with upraised hand, denounces the one who blasphemed. By his side the offender tries to protect himself from the indignant group of men who are armed with stones. A fire is burning on the centre altar, and gathered round it are the deceiving priests, Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. Before them, Moses with lifted rod calls upon God for their punishment. Already they have fallen back, dropping their censers, one grovelling on the ground. Just behind them, and at the left, Aaron is swinging his censer. Again, Moses bends with condemnatory hand over the defilers of the temple, while the earth is opening and swallowing the sinners. The centre middle distance has a fine Roman arch going to the top of the picture, at the right is a ruined building with many Corinthian pillars, and beyond a line of sea-broken coast. Here the three episodes are even less connected than in the other fresco. The separate groups, however, are fine, — extreme violent action contrasting with dignified calm. The architectural background is splendidly done, so well that it has sometimes been credited to Filippino Lippi.

Though on the other side of the chapel and called the Temptation of Our Lord, this fresco really deals principally with the Old Testament. In front of the altar erected in the foreground, a young man is presenting a basin to the High Priest. On each side of these two are men, women, and children, bringing in bundles on their heads, or talking to each other, or simply looking on. Somewhat back and at the side of the altar is the leper with open shirt, while a young man carefully examines him to see if the healing has begun. A white-haired man kneels in front of them, guessed to be the leper's father. At the left a woman comes hurrying in, bearing on her head a bowl, within which are two birds covered with a cloth. It is back of all this that the scenes of the Temptation begin. On a high cliff, Satan, dressed in cloak and cowl, points downward, saying to Christ beside him, "If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread." In the next scene Satan has brought Jesus to the pinnacle of the Temple, supposed to be San Spirito, and signs to him to cast himself down. Then, at the right, upon a mountain, Christ stands with lifted arm, bidding the Devil begone, and the fiend, revealed in his own true character, throws himself down the cliff. After this, angels come to minister to the Lord. The landscape is used remarkably well, and the architectural features are finely rendered. The fresco as a whole is crowded with figures, and at the first it seems as if no one and no group was particularly distinctive. Yet before long one sees that here and there a figure by its inherent dignity or grace of line and pose does stand out and becomes at once so accentuated to the vision that involuntarily it absorbs one's mind ever after. Such is the girl bearing the scarlet-bound bundle of cedar and hyssop on the right. Such, too, is the child at her feet, who has dropped one of his load of grape bunches in his fright at finding a snake just curling about his leg. The group also of the Master with the angels, on the left, where he points out the leper, is full of a tender grace and dignity. It is suggested that this theme, the Cure of the Leper, was chosen in compliment to Sixtus IV., who had built San Spirito as a hospital for lepers.

It is now believed that of the frescoes once supposed to be by Perugino, only the Delivery of the Keys is really his work. The others, once credited to him, as well as the two formerly supposed to be by Signorelli, the majority of critics assign to Pinturicchio, the painter of the Borgia Apartments.

Of these, the Journey of Moses has as many separate divisions in subject as have the Botticelli frescoes. Nevertheless, it has a certain cohesiveness which these lack, and as a decorative piece it is charming. An angel is in the very centre of the foreground, planted firmly upon wide-stretched legs, his head in profile, his figure nearly back to. Rising up almost to the top of his head, his wings sweep nearly to his knees. Standing there with commanding arm, he forms an effectual break and yet a connection between the group starting on their journey headed by Moses, and the ceremony of circumcision carried on at the right. Behind, Jethro and his daughters are taking leave of Moses, and farther back still the shepherds are dancing on the green. At this time Pinturicchio painted such landscape as no other man had succeeded in equalling in charm of sentiment or delicate colour. In this panel are the purple-shadowed hills sloping with golden gleams to the winding stream, the soft stretches of field, and the decorative trees, all so characteristic of the prince of landscape painters of the quattrocento.

The Baptism of Christ is more crowded with figures, and there is less connection between them. There are again the charming landscape background and the carefully studied groups of portrait-like figures. Indeed, the solidity and firmness of drawing and the enchanting expression of many of the heads are among the best work Pinturicchio ever did. The central foreground group shows John pouring the water upon the head of Christ, a carefully and painfully modelled nude figure. Over the Saviour's head is a dove, and above in the sky the Almighty, completely framed into a round filled with cherubs' heads. The sky is sprinkled with more of these, and on each side is an adoring angel with flying draperies. In the middle distance, Christ is twice shown, both times preaching from a height to enormous crowds surging below. Many people also are watching the baptism, and numbers of these are evidently portraits. They have been repainted so many times, and are now so dark and grimy, that little remains to show what they once were. The charm of the landscape, however, is still felt, as well as the decorative parts of the whole.

The one that has so long been attributed to Signorelli, is Moses Giving the Laws to the People. On the right, raised on a stone platform, Moses, now an old man, reads to a big concourse of the Israelites. Here are interesting, characteristic faces and carefully studied forms, all executed with the technical knowledge that Signorelli alone of that age was supposed to possess. Almost merging into this crowd at the left, Moses, surrounded by the elders and leaders, gives over his command to Aaron, who kneels in heavy-hearted reverence before him. Behind the central assemblage, Moses has been shown the distant promised land, and, leaning heavily upon his staff, is just turning from the directing angel. There are great pathos and originality in his fine old figure, as with bent head he goes down the hill. Rarely lovely, too, is the angel above showing the tottering old man the land he is never to reach. Finally, at the left, with only the sky and a few scattered trees for background, they are laying the faithful servant to his rest. Throughout the whole of this composition the individual groups are full of a feeling that never lacks inherent strength.

As a composition, Christ Giving the Keys to Peter is considered to be Perugino's greatest work. It is as coherently arranged, is within as definite lines, and carries the eye of the spectator straight to what is intended for the central, and is the all-pervading idea of the picture, as any of Raphael's own works. In front of Christ kneels Peter, receiving the key. The deep fervour of the disciple, the splendid fall of his drapery, the careful study and rendering of his figure, are all wonderfully expressed. Even more remarkable an achievement is the Christ. The lines of his drapery are incredibly beautiful. The big, simple, wide spaces that lead into the deep shadow-making folds are emphasised by the lighter half-tones of the less marked plaits. The poise and swing of the figure are grandly noble, the head pathetic and full of the soft beauty of the Christ-ideal of the fifteenth century. On each side of him are the apostles, and beyond them others. Behind, the pavement of the Piazza of San Pietro extends far in the rear to the great Basilica of Bramante. A mighty arch finishes the architectural background on each side, and between these and the foreground groups are other figures, running, walking, talking, getting smaller and smaller as they near the distant buildings. Back of all stretches the Umbrian landscape with softly sloping hills and single stiff trees. It is what we may justly call modern painting, — strongly in contrast even to the best of the other frescoes. Here is space, vast, illimitable, only bounded by the sky itself. Here is atmosphere, here is the strong, balanced composition, one part treated in relation to its bearing upon another, here are figures in true perspective, and all making more telling the central idea of the whole.

Next to this must rank Ghirlandajo's Calling of Peter and Andrew. Better, stronger, more perfect in every way than any of the rest, it is doubtful if even one of Perugino's figures can compare with the dignity and inherent grandeur of Jesus, recalling as it does that by Masaccio in the Tribute Money. Behind Jesus stand James and John, and before him kneel Peter and Andrew, to whom the Master is speaking. The crowd of spectators on each side and beyond is admirably massed, and the chiaroscuro is far in advance of the other frescoes on the walls. On the shores of the lake behind, Christ is shown again, with the fishing-boats beyond. There is a distant view of promontories and hills settling down to the water's edge. As is usually true of Ghirlandajo, his colour is too bricky, and he has worked over his shadows till they are leaden. But in chiaroscuro, balance of parts, nobility of figure, strength of mass and line, he has done splendid work.

It is said that of all the paintings in his chapel Sixtus IV. admired those of Cosimo Rosselli most. Rosselli won this admiration easily. Far below his companions in talent, he at least realised two important things. First, that unless his shortcomings could be somewhat covered up, his mediocrity would be patent to all, and next, that the Pope particularly loved all kinds of grandeur and display. Consequently, and for both reasons, his panels were a mass of richest gilding. Robes, crowns, architecture, even the high lights on flesh, were all made of gleaming gold. The Pope saw the prodigal, kingly lavishness of the precious metal, and loved it. Others must have had little chance amid the dazzling display to see the weaknesses and faults beneath.

Of the four the Last Supper is the worst. The curving table, the three windows above with the landscape seen through, the figures automatically placed about the board, without dignity and with no grace, the bad colour, make it what it unquestionably was from the beginning, in spite of papal encomium, — a failure.

The Sermon on the Mount is the least unsuccessful. It is believed that his pupil, Piero di Cosimo, is responsible for the landscape of rolling hills, detached trees and roofs and spires. The scene shows many separate groups listening to Jesus' discourse, as he stands upon a hillock a little back from the centre foreground. His drapery, as well as that of most of the others, is too voluminous and meaningless, but there are individual figures that have both charm and interest.

The Passage of the Red Sea is hopelessly dull except for certain single figures, where are some vigour of action and energy, slightly recalling Benozzo Gozzoli.

As has been mentioned, there were besides these the three frescoes by Perugino at the altar end of the chapel. No drawings of them are known, nor is there left any definite description of them. If they were at all equal to the Delivery of the Keys, the world has lost much in their total disappearance. Only their subjects are left to us, Moses in the Bulrushes, Christ in the Manger, and between the two the Assumption of the Virgin, in which Pope Sixtus IV. was introduced.

If we know only the names of these once famous frescoes, we know equally little of the designer of the beautiful marble screen that separates that part of the chapel reserved for ecclesiastics from the rest of the church. Exquisitely wrought, of most lovely design, who did it or when is not told. It may have been the work of the architect, it may have been the loving labour of some artist long forgotten in name, yet for ever remembered in this marble creation, — a truer expression of himself than any accidental nomenclature.

Such was the chapel when in 1508 Julius II. commanded Michelangelo to decorate the ceiling. It was Bramante, we are told, who suggested this undertaking to the Pope, Bramante, who for the sake of his young protégé, Raphael of Urbino, was jealous of the unquestioned preëminence Michelangelo had won as sculptor. The architect thought, so Vasari gravely states, that if the great Florentine could be diverted from the path in which he had so far outstripped all others, that then there would be no one to compete with Raphael for the Pope's favour.

Whether this is literally true or not, at least it is certain that Michelangelo was with difficulty persuaded to the task. He had already purchased the marble, and was about to begin the wonderful mausoleum Julius had before ordered; he was no painter, he vowed, and he at once suggested that the young Raphael could much better do the work. But the Pope, possibly still backed by Bramante, would accept no excuses. He would have no mausoleum while he was still alive; he had engaged the sculptor's time, and that time should be spent on nothing but the ceiling of the chapel. Thus, grumbling, and with much distaste, the great sculptor was forced into becoming a painter. And to-day, the fame of Michelangelo rests not so much on the works of sculpture he left behind, wonderful as they are. It is the marvel that his brush wrought above the line of those of the quattrocento that has placed him beyond all competitors, as far away from the striving and imitation of those who came after as it is from all who had gone before.

This so-called ceiling is not only the actual roofing. It extends down the walls to the line where the windows begin to spring into their arched tops. The central part of the ceiling is flat. From there it is slightly vaulted, the pendentives ending between each two of the twelve windows. This entire smooth, easily curved surface is covered with painting that leaves not one square inch undecorated. Unlike the earlier wall paintings of the Renaissance, there are no large spaces or even intertwining lines given over to arabesques, wreaths of flowers, fruits, grotesques, and conventional ornament. Figures — figures everywhere. For background or separation, architectural forms alone are used. No ornament per se. With his brush Michelangelo built a structure that, springing from the window, rises in grandly conceived lines, a “temple without a foundation,” yet so artfully, so skilfully designed, that one never thinks of the unreality of its formation. Pilasters, cornices, platforms, arches, and niches, — it is scarcely possible, as one looks upward, to suspect that this marble edifice is but a simulation, — nothing but brush work. It is no wonder that the mere mechanical dexterity, almost the mere trick of the performance, should be so overpowering that even before the mighty design and undermeaning of the whole have been perceived, one exclaims, “Truly here was the greatest genius of the sixteenth or of any century.”

It is almost impossible in words to give a comprehensive idea of the general plan. Very roughly speaking, it may be said to consist of the nine panels illustrating the Genesis story, which fill the central flat part of the vaulting. From this curve the twelve pendentives that spring from between the windows.

They hold the five sibyls and seven prophets seated upon their thrones. Between these pendentives are the arched spaces on the walls over the windows, and the triangular lunettes forming the under sides of the pendentives, and capping the windows visor-wise. In these are painted the ancestors of the Virgin. But such a bare outline contains slight idea of the effect of the whole composition, where every inch is filled with figures or architectural forms, yet so combined and separated, joined and detached, that there is no overcrowding or overelaboration. The nine central panels are separated from each other by a painted framework simulating cornices and pilasters. Five of these, including one at each end, are much smaller than the other four. This is accomplished by a different division of the space allotted to them. The four large ones are simply framed with the painted cornice that takes nothing from the picture room. The five smaller ones are over the prophets and sibyls seated in the pendentives, between the windows. On each side of these massive throned beings are two boy caryatids standing upon a double-based plinth, holding a cornice on their heads. These cornices project, in painting, it is always to be remembered, into and out from the four smaller central panels. Upon each of these cornices is seated the god-like figure of a nude youth, making, since there is one at each corner of the panels, twenty in all. Each two hold the ribbons that are joined to a round medallion, upon which are figures in relief. In some cases the heads or arms, or even shoulders of these seated youths project into the field of the central panel, framed otherwise by a simple ribbing. The four large panels are over the triangular lunettes above the arch of the windows, and completely fill the space between the two sides, save for the narrow spandrels made by the point of the lunette, the rib framework, and the caryatids on each side. Every spandrel holds a bronze-toned nude figure, no two alike, in all conceivable positions, filling the three-cornered space. Below the base of the thrones of the prophets and sibyls are tablets inscribed with their names, these held up by youthful figures, in some cases partially draped. At the four sloping corners of the ceiling, coming between the side and end windows at the entrance end, and joining the altar end to the sides, are four scenes supposed to be the four promises to mankind before the advent of Christ. Symonds says: "An awful sense of coming doom and merited damnation hangs in the thunderous canopy of the Sistine vault, tempered by a solemn and sober expectation of the Saviour." There is, however, in this chapel nowhere a realisation of this expectation. Despair, doom, destruction, from the first temptation to the final judgment, Michelangelo deals not with hope, but with the deserved retribution for misspent years. As has been said, the very elect of Paradise show little of hope or joy. It is the power, might, and resistless force of God, not his love or condonation, that the painter has blazoned forth. The sin, the pride, the weakness of man, rather than his aspiration or his spiritual achievements. And, as has been often remarked, nowhere on the ceiling is the charm, the soothing spirit, or the tenderness of woman displayed. No matter how much those anxious to see every perfection in the works of Michelangelo have praised the face and figure of Eve, it is nevertheless true that at the farthest stretch of imagination she is neither beautiful, nor does she have any of that soft feminine enchantment that, for instance, might answer to the "ewig weibliche," present even in the most doughty of Wagner's heroines. The sibyls are majestic, mighty, inscrutable, an incarnation of insight, knowledge, and power, — woman not sublimated so much as incarnated in an entirely sexless, if highly vitalised form. And in spite of their majestic calm and forceful, puissant grandeur, one finds not hope so much as a stern integrity, a lofty purpose far and away removed from joy or gladness. No — in the whole immense series bearing the name of the most solitary genius that ever lived, it is only in the figures of his youthful men that we find any of the gladness, the spring, and the elixir of life. And the Sistine, in spite of its overwhelming tragic significance, has innumerable figures of these youths. In the twenty young "athletes," holding the ribbons of the medallions in the central vaulting, the twenty-four bronze figures filling the spandrels, or the forty-eight "twinning caryatids," — the youthful male is shown in every variety of movement, position, and expression. Above all, they express some of the mere physical joy of living, as well as mental exuberance. The faces of the twenty central youths are very wonders for their sensitive, entrancing beauty, with eyes through which the soul shines seekingly. But most of all it is the rhythmic poetry that controls their limbs, the grand lines of their thorax, the very electricity that seems to throb through every inch of the pulsating flesh — it is the physical manifestation of the ecstasy of merely being that is the most compelling thing about them.

The story of the nine central panels begins at the altar end of the chapel. At the opposite end, Michelangelo commenced his work, and the first three divisions are filled with much smaller figures than the rest. It is supposed that when so far along, he realised that the effect from below would be much more impressive with fewer and larger figures. The first of the series, in the story, is directly over Jonah, the prophet on the pendentive that gives the double arch to the altar end of the chapel. This is one of the smaller panels, and at its corners are four of the beautiful seated youths, each one, it seems, more beautiful than his neighbour. The Creation of Light gives Jehovah in a whirling cloud of drapery, his figure thrown diagonally across the panel, and nearly completely filling it. As in all the paintings of the Renaissance, He, the Creator, is represented very nearly as one would represent a patriarch of Israel, with flowing beard and heavy white mane of hair. Ineffectual, and often weak and undignified as most of these portrayals are, they are very different under the compelling genius of Michelangelo. Considering the feeling and custom of the time, it is not too much to say that in these pictures of the beginning of all things, he has created a Jehovah such as never before nor since has been done by the brush of man. There is something very Godlike and awe-inspiring in the powerful frame that yet floats as easily in the firmament as if it were merely part of the ether about it.

The second panel is the Creation of the Sun and Moon. Here God is presented in two positions. In the right hand division, attended with angels, he is sweeping forward through the sky, both arms extended, the forefinger of his right hand resting momentarily upon the great globe that half rises above the ribbed framework. At the other side he is rushing through space away from the spectator, with one hand lifted over a mass of vegetation that appears near the left-hand corner of the fresco.

In the third, "He is hovering over the waters," as Grimm expresses it, this time again with the accompanying angels. And "hovering" exactly describes the soft floating movement with which he rides the air, both hands flung out, his head with its heavy masses of hair and beard bent downward with a brooding tenderness that mingles with the infinite power of the face. The sweep of his mantle behind him, the whirling clouds about, all are full of the very spirit of the Almighty himself.

The fourth panel is probably the most celebrated of all. The Creation of Man gave Michelangelo an unsurpassed chance to represent what he loved best of all, the perfect figure of a young man. Nothing more perfect, it may well be imagined, could be conceived than this first man half reclining on the mountain top, not yet awakened sufficiently to stand upon his feet. The attitude of Adam is no less beautiful than his beautiful figure. He has just raised himself upon his right elbow, the action twisting the upper part of his body round into full face, with his left leg drawn sharply up. It is the preliminary poise before arising. Not for more than a moment, one would think, could he hold the attitude. Yet so full of ease, grace, and unexpended strength is it that any sense of strain or weariness is entirely lacking. And indeed weariness is the last thing to be thought of in connection with that superb young body. If the muscles have been so far unused, they have nothing of flabby softness about them. Firm, gloriously, evenly developed, Michelangelo here shows none of the exaggeration of flesh and form of which sometimes even at his greatest he is guilty. Poised above Adam is the Almighty. His far out-reaching hand has almost touched the answering hand of Adam. One can fairly feel the pulsing, throbbing life that will respond to that magnetic touch. Behind Jehovah is a tremendous, swirling cloud of drapery, and sheltered within it and protected by his encircling arm, are some exquisite child angels, gazing with eager, loving eyes at the man figure below. God is draped in a robe that covers but does not hide his form. Every curving line is felt through the clinging robe. The colour of it is a lucent violet gray, as if woven of clouds. His face expresses infinite benignity, without joy, almost, perhaps, without hope.

The next, the Creation of Eve, is one of the small divisions with the four splendid youths on the pedestals at the corners. These graceful, lovely-faced figures have much more charm than the certainly heavy and decidedly matronly form of Eve. She, apparently just sprung from Adam's side, is half-kneeling with clasped hands before the Eternal. This time the Lord is walking upon the earth he has created, and here he is more than ever like a patriarch of the tribe of Israel. Wrapped in a voluminous garment, which he draws with one hand close about him, with the other he admonishes or instructs this, his last creation. Adam lies in a slightly raised position on the side of the hill, still sunken in slumber. Not to be profane, one can not help wondering how he, in his magnificent young beauty and elasticity, will regard this somewhat stocky, rather coarse-lined femininity bestowed upon him.

A double story is in the sixth compartment, that of the Temptation and the Expulsion from Paradise. The fatal tree of knowledge fills the centre of the composition. Around its trunk are wound the fat, yellow folds of an enormous serpent, that up in the branches end in the figure of a woman. She is reaching down an apple to Eve, who, seated facing in the opposite direction, has twisted herself round and is eagerly stretching up her hand for the fruit. Standing beside her, pulling down a branch with one hand, with the other Adam is feeling among the leaves. It is quite — begging Herr Grimm's pardon — as if, whether Eve had taken the apple or no, it would have been but a few minutes before her mate had secured a taste of the coveted fruit.

Here Eve is slighter than in the former panel, and by so much loss of flesh so much more attractive. On the other side of the tree, the angel with avenging sword pushes the guilty pair from paradise. The wonderful realism of the two cowering figures is beyond words. Nothing more real to the sense of touch as well as to sight can be imagined. The two sinners exist here with a corporeal certainty that almost makes them more living than the living themselves. They are equally impressive in their attitudes and expressions. Adam strides forward with arms thrown protestingly backward as if imploring the angel. Despair and terror are on his face as he hurries on. Eve on the other side is more cowering than Adam, but perhaps less despairing. Head and back bent, hair flying about her, she has drawn up her arms in a very terror of shame, clutching her golden tresses with her hands. But, in spite of shame and terror, she has ventured to look back curiously at the angel. One is tempted to think she has still a sense of the possibilities that may lie before her.

The seventh, eighth, and ninth frescoes, in consequence of the smaller figures that fill them, are that much less effective. First of the master's work, it is only after the last of the three that he seems to have entered into the labour with both surety and enthusiasm. The one next to the Expulsion from Paradise is the Sacrifice of Noah. Here, behind the altar stand Noah and his wife, while his sons and servants are preparing the animals for slaughter, and brightening the fire.

The following, being the last of the four larger ones, is a scene of the Deluge. The lack of concentration and point of focus that are often felt in Michelangelo's designs are here extremely apparent. Up to a wind-swept barren cliff, with one naked tree at the far left, the doomed people are struggling, clinging to their chattels, their children, or each other. One wretch has climbed the tree and is hanging there with desperate hands. Beyond, the flood rages, threatening destruction to a small, overloaded boat in the centre of the torrent, and steadily rising higher over a rocky embankment where are more despairing mortals. One man, who is walking through the shallows to the higher ground, carries another flung over his shoulder, the limpness of the body wonderfully expressed. Farther beyond, rides the ark, triumphant. The lack of centrality in the composition is counterbalanced by the remarkable construction, modelling, and attitudes of the individual figures.

The last of the series, the first of Michelangelo's labours, is the Drunkenness of Noah. Stretched out asleep, half-lifted on his elbow, the old man lies, the aspirations and the virtues of his earlier days forgotten. One of his sons stands deriding, while the other two cover him with a mantle. At the corners of this picture are left only three of the four young "athletes." The other, except for head and foot and part of a leg, has been entirely wiped away. The fascinating beauty of the head that is left, makes its destruction doubly mournful.

On the pendentive over the altar sits Jonah, with his head and upper part of his torso thrown far back and twisted to his right. The left arm, brought sharply across the body over to the right hand, emphasises the double action of the figure. There is some of the exaggeration of form here that Michelangelo is so often accused of, but it does not spoil what is a very beautiful as well as a powerful figure. At the prophet's right is a conventionalised whale, — scarcely larger than Jonah's thigh, and above the animal's head are two children.

At the extreme other end, on the pendentive between the simulated windows of the entrance-wall, is the Prophet Zacharias. He is an old man, bearded and sitting in profile, with heavy draperies, lifting the book he is reading in both hands close to his eyes, while behind him stand the two children genii, their hands clasped as they read over his shoulder.

Between these two, on each side of the wall, are placed the other five prophets and five sibyls. On the right of the entrance are Joel, Erythræa, Ezekiel, the Persian Sibyl, and Jeremiah. On the left are the Delphic Sibyl, Isaiah, the Cumæan Sibyl, Daniel and the Libyan Sibyl. The most beautiful of the prophets, perhaps, are Jeremiah, Isaiah, and Daniel, and of the sibyls the Delphic, Erythræan and Libyan.

No two of any of these are alike in pose or drapery. When one considers the twenty seated youths of the ceiling and these twelve seated figures here, it is not one of the least astonishing of Michelangelo's feats that he could vary pose and movement so remarkably.

Jeremiah, the first on the left of the altar, as one faces the entrance, is sitting squarely in full face, his feet crossed beneath his robe, his chin buried in his right hand, with the elbow on his knee, the other hand falling loosely into his lap. The eyes are cast down, too, and the simple, dignified attitude expresses a thoughtfulness as deep as it is far from pleasant anticipation. The whole position is that of careworn weariness. From the virile, sinewy hands to the broad, strong shoulders, and the grand, aging head, the characterisation is as clear, marked, and decisive as the drawing is faultless, masterly. The two genii are behind him, and their heads, too, are drooped as if in sympathetic appreciation.

Farther along on the same side is the Erythræan Sibyl, sitting nearly in full profile, with her knees crossed, her left hand turning the leaves of a big book on a stand beside her. Her right hand is dropped at her side. She is a youthful but matronly figure, of full form yet not heavy, with an earnest, questioning face. Her noble head, large eyes, and curving lips, are full of a meditative calm that adds to the abstraction of the figure. Behind her a boy stands blowing at a firebrand, with which he is to light her lamp.

On the other wall, exactly opposite this, is the prophet Isaiah. He is in what would be full face if it were not that he had turned his head toward his right shoulder, listening to one of the two small boys behind him. This boy is charmingly piquant, and his face has a roguish charm as he gazes at the prophet and motions far away with his right arm. Leaning with his left elbow upon a book which he partly holds open with the fingers of his right hand, Isaiah is a splendid specimen of manhood scarcely beyond youth. Grace and life, vigour and thought, are in every line of the proud head and form. There is a certain feeling of loftiness about him, a sort of aristocratic calm, that would well become "the noblest Roman of them all."

Next to him, toward the entrance, sits the Delphic Sibyl, perhaps more universally considered a beautiful woman than any other feminine figure Michelangelo ever drew. And beautiful beyond doubt she is, with besides a sort of weird, supernatural attraction. It is difficult to think of her as mere woman. Her youth and the soft curves of cheek and lip, the wide, deep eyes, are all full of a significance and comprehension beyond the ken of normal womanhood. She is placed with her body slightly in profile, but her head is turned full to the spectator. With her left arm she holds up a scroll, the lower part of which touches the right knee. This throws the arm straight across her body, bringing the elbow out beyond the plane of her face. Her right hand has fallen on to her knee, partly closed and holding a bit of drapery. At her side are the two accompanying boys, one reading to the other whose head alone is visible over the sibyl's shoulders. There is a sweep to her drapery that answers to the spirit in her glorious eyes. Some unearthly zephyr has surely stirred the scarf on her shoulders, and set in gentle waves the loose hair that curls down her shoulder.

At the far other end of the line is the Libyan Sibyl, of almost equal though more mature beauty. She, as Vasari says of this extraordinarily conceived figure, "having completed the writing of a large book taken from other volumes, is on the point of rising with a movement of feminine grace, and at the same time shows the intention of lifting and putting aside the book, a thing so difficult that it would certainly have proved impossible to any other than the master of this work." This double movement is wonderfully indicated, and is, perhaps, the greatest marvel of the creation. Though one foot is bent under her, and the other is lifted on the toes, yet the motion to rise has not so far actually brought her from her seat. It is this amazing choice of the moment of the action that prevents any strain in the position, or any sympathetic ache in the spectator. There can be felt neither the weariness of a too long continued movement or a sense of anxiety as to when the strain will be over.

Younger than Isaiah, imposing as Jeremiah, with a grace almost equal to the Delphic Sibyl, Daniel sits upon the next throne. The big book, which partly rests upon his lap, is mostly supported by the arms and shoulders of a charming naked boy standing between Daniel's knees. Sitting full face, but bending to the right, Daniel is inscribing something upon the tablet on the block beside him. He is scanning his lines with great earnestness, and he has flung his left arm over the book in his lap, so that the wrist helps to keep it in position. The ease, freedom, grace, and splendid swing of the figure are a triumphant achievement even for Michelangelo. Nothing more real, more perfect in line and mass, could be dreamed of. The head of the prophet is somewhat round, with a wide, full forehead, from which his hair is tumbled backward as if but a moment before he had run impatient fingers through it. His face is in nearly three-quarters, the eyes are down, a slight pressure about the lips expressing the intentness with which he works. But the most beautiful thing about him, perhaps, is the left hand hanging over the edge of the book. Those fine, firm sinews and muscles, the curve of the wrist bone, the hang of the fingers, the swelling muscle of the forearm, — surely nothing could be a better example of the gifts and attainments of this master of the human form.

In the arches over the windows is what Vasari calls the genealogy of the patriots, giving the ancestors of Christ, beginning with the sons of Noah. These are all in various positions in many kinds of draperies, but mostly of full, abundant lines. In every arch, directly in the centre over the window, is a tablet with the names of the persons represented. This disposition of the space leaves only the curve of the sides for the figures. The positions necessary for this are, therefore, generally seated ones, though often children are introduced standing singly or in pairs at the feet of the adult forms. The hand of time, the restorer, and the bad light make these very difficult to decipher.

Somewhat better preserved, but still more difficult to see, are the figures in the tympana or spandrels between the points of the lunettes and the sibyls. These are the bronze nudes exactly filling those narrow spaces. Attitudes again so free, so full of subtle distinction and change, that any account of them sufficient for full description would require pages.

The four scenes in the four corners of the vaulting are painted in very unequal divisions of peculiar angles, and although with many individual figures of great beauty, do not come up to the ceiling as a whole. They represent the deliverances of the Jewish nation.

Judith, with the head of Holofernes, has much grace and simplicity. The victim is on a couch at the right, with feet toward the observer. The result is that in the shadow about the upper part of his body the absence of the head is not noticed. At the left, hurrying from the open door, is Judith, turning to look back at the body. Or perhaps she is shrinking from the laden salver borne by the maid in front of her. Her figure is fine.

The Elevation of the Brazen Serpent gives a whirling mass of legs and torsos and arms that, while well filling the angular interspace, leaves one confused and with no clear idea of the subject.

The Crucifixion of Haman has some wonderful foreshortening, and a masterly drawing of the nude figure squarely in the centre.

David Killing Goliath is almost archaic in its simplicity.

Kugler says the "so-called Genealogy of the Virgin, occupying not alone the arches, but the spandrels above the windows as well, is a succession of groups of a simple and domestic kind, showing no distinct event, but rather that form of family life so familiar in pictures of the time, but not otherwise treated by the great master, and offering interesting points of comparison with Raphael."

The colours of the whole chapel have faded, the plaster is cracked from end to end, there is scarcely a two-inch space free. The cleanser has washed with ignorant hands the very life away from some of the choicest parts. Yet the cool grays, the dull browns and golds and reds and greens are not so ruined as to be displeasing. This general submerging of the colours gives it perhaps a more architectural and so a more monumental character. The might of the whole conception, the power of the presentation, the marvellous majesty of the entire roofing, this it is that makes mere words of description utterly weak, inadequate, futile. One can describe it no more nearly than one can write descriptions of the greatest of Beethoven's symphonies. One can explain it as little as one can explain Hamlet. Power, majesty, might — neither before nor since has the brush thus triumphed. It is the crowning work of the greatest mind that was ever in artist's body.

Thirty years after the completion of this ceiling, Michelangelo was once more at work in the Sistine. The three altar frescoes of Perugino were washed from the wall, and the Last Judgment begun. The pendentive of the vaulting upon which Jonah is throned divides the top of the fresco into two arches. Within them are crowds of angels holding the instruments of the Passion. Together they form two immense wreaths of figures, repeating in reverse the curves of the arches. In the upper part of the centre of the composition is Christ, seated within an ellipse-shaped glory. Beside him is Mary. About them is a circle of prophets, patriarchs, apostles, and saints, and beyond space and light. The curving outlines of the spheres of the blessed sweep down into a vast arch, above which is Heaven, below, Earth and Hell. Originally all the figures were nude, but while Michelangelo was still living, the Pope had Daniele da Volterra, a follower of Michelangelo, put draperies on many of them. He was called in consequence "Il Bragghettone," the breeches-maker. Afterward, in the time of Pius V., Girolamo da Fano continued the process started by Da Volterra.

The plane in the picture below that where the martyrs surround Christ, is made of three masses.

LAST JUDGMENT

By Michelangelo; in Sistine Chapel

The central section is held by a band of gigantic cherubs, who, blowing furiously upon long trumpets, are waking the dead. The forceful gusto of these announcers of the Day of Doom is so awe-compelling that the very walls seem to echo with their reverberating call. To the left, above the open graves, come the souls for judgment, some in air so misty as half to hide their grave-clothes, some assisted by angels and saints. On the right are the condemned, falling down to their abysmal torments, beaten back from the heights by vindictive angels, hauled by arm or hair or legs by grinning demons, — crowds of them, shoals of them, shrieking, screaming, a seething, torrid mass. Here is where Michelangelo's talent for expression shines with no uncertain power. Such anguish, such terror, such despair, are the proper accompaniment of the huge figures, with heavy ribbed muscles, small, pugilistic heads. It must be admitted, also, that the shapes he chose for the blessed are not the happiest to express eternal joy. Indeed, there is slight hint of happiness even among the saved. Stolid resignation or a vacuous inanity are the prevailing types of the ascending souls, while the saints and martyrs near Christ appear to be demanding retribution and heavy-handed justice rather than clemency or forgiveness. Mary alone, in her shrinking attitude, seems to recoil from the fearful judgment that the terrible Son is pronouncing. He bears no resemblance to the meek Jesus, to the intermediary, to the Son who gave his own life to save the world. Rather, in all the awful anger of an avenger is he shown. In his colossal, muscular might, he suggests one of the victors of the gladiatorial ring. Below, on the lowest plane of all, on the right, is the opening of Hell. Michelangelo here follows the description of Dante. Charon forces a crowd of unhappy spirits into his boat to the other side of the dark river, where is Minos, Judge of the Infernal. The opening graves fill the left lowest half of the fresco. Here the unjudged are struggling upward, some in their shrouds, some mere skeletons, rising toward the Throne of Justice, some helped by the spirits above, some helping others.

Any real consideration of this fresco is out of the question. Blackened by the smoke of altar candles, still more by the burning of the conclave ballots, washed by the restorer, repainted and redraped by the commands of a prudish age, there is little left to tell how this enormous composition once impressed the beholder. Here and there from its turmoil one picks a figure, and finds it a marvel of anatomical knowledge, proof that even in his old age Michelangelo's brush had not lost its cunning. But if at times he could still thus accomplish, as surely he did and could exaggerate even more flamingly.

The overpreponderance of muscle, the overdevelopment of arms or legs or thorax, the undersized heads, here is the beginning of the decadence that in the Pauline Chapel proclaims Michelangelo what even here his years had made him, — an old man, with only the ragged mantle of mannerism left him. One thing may be said. The accusation against the lack of centrality, against the unskilful massing of the divisions of the Last Judgment seem rather far-fetched. To Michelangelo's mind and to his time, the Judgment Day meant such a confusion, perturbation, convulsion, that any sort of focus would have been impossible. He gives the Judge the central space, and so entirely that even in its present blackened, discoloured condition, one's eyes seek him first. After that there is no plan. The dead arise and are hurled down to deeper abyss, or they arise and join the saints. But amid the thousands thus called by the trump of Doom, what form, what order, what shape is possible? Or, if possible, it is questionable if regular or mathematical or even artistic massing would give the effect here conveyed, of a state that is a worse frenzy than chaos.

CHAPTER V.

THE STANZE OF RAPHAEL

Two rooms full of very mediocre modern pictures lead directly into the Sala dell' Immacolata. This was decorated by Podesti, under Pius IX., with frescoes celebrating the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin, a doctrine promulgated on December 8, 1854. These frescoes are chiefly interesting because they contain portraits of many of the ecclesiastics contemporary to that time. Among the subjects are the Proclamation of the Dogma, the Adoration of the Image of the Virgin, and the Reception of the News by the Virgin in Heaven. Though some of these are interesting and even spirited, by their very location they fail to rouse much enthusiasm. For from this room one steps directly into the Stanze of Raphael.

Of the four rooms of the series, the first in order, the Camera dell' Incendio ranks first only in position. It was in the fifth, the Camera della Segnatura, where was the scene of Raphael's earliest labours in the Vatican, and it is in the fifth that one still sees the most perfect expression of that genius that, at twenty-one, dominated Rome, as it has since dominated the larger part of the art of the Christian world.

As has been remarked in the first chapter, Raphael came to Rome in 1509 merely as one of the corps of artists ordered by Julius II. to make beautiful the papal home. Of the works of all these others, Sodoma's decorations of the ceiling of the Segnatura and the Perugino frescoes in that of the Incendio are all that the Pope permitted to remain once he realised the capabilities of this youngster from Urbino.

The four rooms are oblong in shape, with a vaulting whose pendentives come low down in the corners. The wall space on each side, therefore, is semicircular, broken in the two narrower ends by a deep-set window. Raphael's problem consequently was to surmount the difficulties caused by a cross-light, as well as to conform to the badly divided space of the windowed wall. Seen to-day in all the finished perfection of a compositional harmony that seems equally easily accomplished and inevitable, it is interesting and, to the student, most instructive to learn that all this apparently facile result did not come at once even to Raphael. The studies for the first of his great frescoes, the Disputa, show that at first he was overwhelmed by the very immensity of the space he must cover. Even the sketches nearest the painting are lacking in some of the finest points of the finished result. Raphael's power of assimilation was part of his capacity for learning rapidly. Yet, though after this first fresco he never again was so embarrassed by the limits or extent of his canvas, no veriest plodder in the artistic ranks ever trusted less to the inspiration of the moment. Or perhaps it would be more correct to say to the inspiration of any one moment. The museums of Europe abound with innumerable drawings of separate and grouped figures, in all sorts of attitudes, one after another of which he rejected before he found what he finally chose for picture or fresco.

On the two long, unbroken walls of the Camera della Segnatura are the Disputa and the School of Athens. Parnassus and Jurisprudence fill the windowed sides. Above each one is an allegorical figure in a large, ornamented circle. Connecting these, and dropping somewhat below them into the triangular spaces of the corners, are heavily bordered squares representing the Temptation, Judgment of Solomon, Creation of Planets, Marsyas and Apollo. Above these again, between the upper curves of the allegories, are smaller designs, which, as well as the allegories, are separated from the centre by ornamented bands in gold and blue and colours. In the very centre is the large octagon, within which, against a blue sky, children support the Pope's escutcheon. Sodoma is the author of at least a considerable portion of this ceiling decoration. Originally the window had richly coloured stained glass panes, from the hand of William of Marseilles. These, as well as the ornate wainscoting, with seats of fine inlaid work, once covering the walls all around to a man's height, have long since vanished. But there is still preserved the sumptuous mosaic flooring, after the antique, where are seen the emblems of the Rovere.

The small square panel of the Creation of the Heavenly Bodies is supposed to be Raphael's first finished picture in the Vatican. After this came the Judgment of Solomon, the Temptation, and then Apollo and Marsyas.

The Creation of Worlds is represented by a woman, stooping over a transparent orb on which one of her hands is lying. No Christian saint or angel, she is more allied to one of the goddesses of the pagan heavens. Her look and gesture, as she watches the earth revolve in the centre of the crystal-like ball, through which her tunic and feet are visible, are full of surprise. Two boys by her side carrying books wing their way from little clouds, and smile at each other across the sky. The grace and arrangement of light and shade hint of the Raphael of later days. But the pose and movement of the children still show the Perugian influence. His colour scheme is an adaptation of the mosaics in the early basilicas.

In the Judgment of Solomon, the king is shown as an aged man sitting on his throne, with his eyes fixed upon the executioner. This individual, grasping the child by the heels, stands with his back to the spectator. The real mother throws herself forward to stop him; the false one, on her knees at the foot of the throne, holds out her hands to the corpse which lies on the ground. Nothing is lacking here in the lines of the composition, in balance of light and shade and contrast of movement.

Adam, in the Temptation, rests on a bank near the fatal tree. The coils of the woman-headed serpent are wound about the tree-trunk, while from the branches the head watches Adam as he takes the fig from his other half. Eve herself has the beauty of form and grace of pose of a Greek Venus. But in the foreshortened features of her face, as she looks down at her companion, are distinct traces of Raphael's Umbrian and Florentine training.

The Apollo and Marsyas augured well for the Parnassus to follow. Here Raphael demonstrated that he could treat subjects inviting comparison with the antique with perfect success. In the middle of the scene a shepherd holds a crown of laurel above the god's head, who is sitting to the left, clasping his lyre. With his raised right hand he is signing to the other shepherd holding the knife ready for the flaying. Marsyas is bound to the tree with his arms in such a way that his toes barely reach the ground. His shape at once recalls the ancient statues of Marsyas. The composition is well if somewhat arbitrarily filled.

As said, above each of the four great wall paintings is an allegorical figure, a personification of the subject in the fresco below. In Theology, which is therefore above the Disputa, the colours have faded and changed, — only the clouds have kept their transparency and light. The girl sitting between the two tablet-bearing boys, who are dancing on the clouds, is looking downward with a gentle, intent expression. Her auburn hair, garlands of leaves, and a veil floating in the breeze are reminders that Raphael still clung to a Florentine type, recalling almost equally Perugino and Fra Bartolommeo.

Poetry, above the Parnassus, is conceived of as a sibyl, and at her sides are winged genii, carrying tablets that in Virgil's words claim she is inspired by the Deity. Here Raphael has left behind him the affectations of the school of Perugino. The masculine vigour that in spite of his inherent sweetness and light was a part of him, becomes more manifest. Seated with her wings opened, Poetry turns her face in the opposite direction from the pose of her body. The modeling of the forms is exquisite, her eye full of a creative fire. Her right hand holds a book on one of her knees, her left supports a lyre, her feet are gracefully crossed in front. Beautifully draped about the waist and arms, her tunic leaves her right forearm bare.

Like the other three, Justice, over Jurisprudence, is seated on clouds that float over a gold mosaic background. She holds a sword above her head in her right hand, and lower, in her left, the scales. Her eyes are downcast, but not blinded, and altogether she is a sweet-faced, not too heavy maiden, whose attributes rather than expression indicate her vocation. On each side of her are two charming genii in most delightful variety of action, holding the tablets bearing the motto for the picture. In the distribution of line and mass the composition is irreproachable, but the execution is less satisfactory.

Full of memories of the antique is Philosophy, placed above the School of Athens. She is sitting on a golden chair whose arms are shaped in imitation of the many-headed Diana of Ephesus, symbol, as Grimm says, of all-sustaining nature. In her star-embroidered tunic and flowered mantle, with her two hands holding upright the books of moral and natural philosophy, and in the two boys carrying tablets inscribed with the words, "Causarum Cognito," are reminders of the statues of the ancients. Her position, turn of head, and noble face are dignified and simple.

All of the four rounds have suffered from time and the restorers' hands. The backgrounds of all are of gold mosaic. In Theology retouching has spoiled the flesh shadows, and the green mantle is sadly damaged. Philosophy is full of patches and additions. Poetry is apparently entirely the work of Raphael. In Justice the draperies are poor, and these and some other parts may be assigned to assistants.

When Julius II. ordered the Disputa, he was especially desirous that this picture, which was to be an epitome of religion according to the Roman doctrines, should be at the same time a memento of what was to be the greatest act of his pontificate, — the rebuilding of St. Peter's. Therefore Raphael laid the scene in the court of an unfinished building where the marble piers are hardly raised above the heads of the people. Of the altar itself, on which is placed the sacrament, one writer remarks that it seems to indicate the marble stone which the Pope had sealed in the depths of the old basilica a few years before.

The Disputa shows clearly the effect upon Raphael of Leonardo and Fra Bartolommeo, as well as his studies of the remains of the art of Greece. In consequence, there is less uniformity of style than in some others of his creations. Yet, perhaps of all his frescoes no other interests the beholder more. Though some of the parts may be unequal, the effect of the whole is that of "a splendid vision." It may be said to be composed of three divisions, two of these in heaven, the third on the earth. Above all is the Lord Almighty; the middle celestial region holds Christ, Mary, John the Baptist, and the prophets, saints, and apostles. In the lowest division is the assemblage about the sacrament. In spite of this arbitrary placing, the three sections do not exist independently. They are connected, not only in the intellectual scheme of the composition, but in the actual technical presentation of it. If there are certain mannerisms and what might almost be called archaisms in the upper portions, nevertheless there is that homogeneity of the whole that is never lacking in Raphael's creations.

God, in the highest curve of the arch of the fresco, is clad in tunic and mantle, clouds covering him below the waist. He bears the crystal orb and gives the benediction. His bearded head within its lozenge-shaped halo is characteristic of the old mid-Italian church type; and the hems and borders of his garments, ornamented with gold microscopically treated, are of the same order. But there is more of the noble simplicity of the classic in his impressive attitude and gesture and in the dignity of his frame. From his sky, reflecting old tradition again, are the rays that spread out through an atmosphere full of delicately toned boy angels, against a star-spattered ground, below which other angels support a fringe of cloud. Quite different are the six lovely winged seraphs that float in the air before this cloud at the Eternal's side. They are conceived in the very spirit of the old Greek Victories. Slightly below, seated on the clouds, is Christ, his white shroud slipped back to show the wound in his side. His two hands are upraised, displaying the stigmata, and they, with the depth of earnestness of his face, tell the story of his redemption, as much as the bending figure of the Madonna on one side or John the Baptist on the other. Around the group is a halo of rays, bordered by a semicircle of light in which cherub heads are flying. It is all after the Umbrian traditions, and, lovely as it is in its own way, shows that Raphael was here still bound by his early schooling. This central group is finished by the dove at Christ's feet, and four winged boys carrying the volumes of the Gospels. It rests, as it were, on a semicircle of clouds where are seated, at the extreme ends, St. Peter and St. Paul, and between, Adam and Abraham, John the Apostle and James, Moses and Daniel, Lawrence and Stephen, Jeremiah and Judas Maccabæus. Below these thick white clouds is the sky seen by earth eyes, and then comes the terrestrial portion of the painting. In the centre is the altar, slightly raised and approached by broad steps. On each side are the fathers and doctors of the Church. At one end are blocks of half-cut marble, at the other a landscape of low hills, sloping to the lake. The assemblage is grouped with the wonderful freedom, and has the natural and splendid massing of which Raphael was past master. Almost all of them are historical portraits. In front on the left, leaning on the stone balustrade, a middle-aged man draws the attention of a youth walking to the altar to a book into which a group of others are looking. He is Bramante, the genius of the new St. Peter's. At the altar itself are Jerome, Gregory, Ambrose, and Augustine. Connecting them with the noted figures far at each end, are bishops and youths, saints and martyrs. Among others are plainly seen the face of Dante, standing just in front of Savonarola, and before them is Innocent III. The names of these are told by inscriptions written in the nimbus encircling their heads, or else they are so well known by innumerable portraits that names are unnecessary.

Above, in the sky, are many beautiful figures. Mary, as she kneels before Christ, has a tender loveliness that is not less charming because of its pre-

DETAIL FROM THE "DISPUTA"

Raphaelic traits. One of the most interesting is Adam, who, sitting calmly with one leg thrown over the other, is, as Grimm observes, full of an "aristocratic ease." And everywhere are the most exquisite angels and angels' heads. The clouds seem fairly permeated with them; as far as eye can pierce the blue vapour, shine with faint but heavenly light these angelic hosts.

But it is in the lower plane that we begin to see the Raphael who could paint the School of Athens, the Jurisprudence, and the Mass of Bolsena. The grouping shows the balance, the unerring sense of coherent composition, so marked an attribute of Raphael from this time on. The vigour, too, in the individual figures, the long free lines full of verve and character, the spirited positions and splendid counterbalance in the groupings, all make such a vivid, life-like assemblage, that it is no wonder the fresco as a whole is the most famous or best known of all his works.

Of the School of Athens on the opposite wall, Crowe and Cavalcaselle say it "is simply the finest, best balanced, and most perfect arrangement of figures that was ever put together by the genius of the Italian Revival, and the scene in which it is set is the most splendid display of monumental architecture that was ever made in the sixteenth century."

The scene takes place on the steps at the entrance to an open air palace and temple, of proportions so idealised that the choicest remains of the greatest Greek temples pale before its perfection. In the immediate foreground the tiled pavement of the court ends at the wide, low marble steps that stretch nearly across the whole picture. At the front and on the sides of these steps are groups of philosophers and students so arranged that each individual is a connecting link in a chain leading to the two philosophers who form the centre of the picture. These two stand side by side, slightly back from the edge of the platform, the one on the right, Aristotle, pointing to the earth, Plato by his side lifting his hand to heaven. There is no hint of dispute between them, though each looks attentively at the other, as if wishing to impress him with his doctrines. The architecture that rises in majestic lines about and over them is an arched aisle, supported on huge pilasters and broken by a cupola and a transept. Through the dome of the cupola, and over the last arch beyond the transept, the clouds float across the shining sky. No setting could be more appropriate, more grandly impressive for this "school" of philosophy. Vasari states that Bramante designed the edifice and indeed the proportions are such as he alone could have conceived, — Bramante, who was filled with the secrets of the ancients and who revitalised them with the spirit of the Renaissance. The decorations of the building are no less remarkable. The vaultings are cut into a beautiful hexagonal pattern, the cornices and capitals are exquisite in a grave simplicity, and the whole is heightened by reliefs and statues so designed by Raphael that they partake of the essence of Greek art without being in any sense mere copies.

It is in the grouping and massing of his philosophers that Raphael's power shines at its brightest. Almost any individual picked at random shows a mastery of form, of drapery, of characterisation unsurpassed by any other painter. But not only is each individual perfectly studied and completely expressed; he is even more carefully considered in his relation to those about him. Yet so easily is it all done that the picture seems to compose of itself. One could scarcely imagine as possible a single change in the slightest detail. It is as if it all happened spontaneously but with the rarest perfection. There have been many names given to these figures, and indeed there has been much debate as to the real subject of the whole fresco. Grimm and others have claimed that it represents the entrance of Paul into the midst of the Athenian philosophers. The balance of opinion, however, is as stated above, that the two central figures are Plato and Aristotle. Below these steps on the left, bending over his book and writing from the table of harmonies held before him by a pupil, is the noble figure of Pythagoras. On the other side Bramante, posing as Archimedes, is leaning far down over a geometrical figure which he is spanning with a pair of compasses, while about him are a number of students earnestly watching him. Near by are Ptolemy, or perhaps Zoroaster, and behind are Raphael, and possibly Perugino. The figure stretched out on the steps to the right of the centre, with such astonishing compositional effect, is Diogenes. Above, on the platform, to the left of Plato is clearly recognised the pugnacious face of Socrates.

But whatever or whoever they may be, it is the way one part is connected with another; the gradations by which the sight is carried along to the central point of focus; the individual grandeur of the figures and the splendid lines of drapery; the swinging poses; the difficult foreshortening; the infinite variety of movement and position that make an overwhelming impression. "The spirit which pervades the School of Athens is that of Giotto, Ghirlandajo, Leonardo, and Michelangelo. Tempering these are Raphael's own innate nobleness and grace, and his constant appeal from the ideal and classic to nature. Combining all these qualities into his picture, he exhibits as additional elements of charm, a broader style of execution, a most striking balance of light and shade and a greater richness of harmonious colour than he had hitherto attained in his practice of fresco." The surface of the School of Athens has been badly hurt by abrasion and discolouration; the architecture has faded to such a degree that some of the reliefs are almost indistinguishable. A long fissure cuts right through the head of Diogenes. A still longer one strikes through the whole picture and divides the figure of the two philosophers ascending and descending the steps.

Filling one of the window ends of the Camera is the Parnassus. It thus forms a semicircular design with a square hole cut from its centre by the window. Apollo is directly over this opening, seated on a rocky rise, from which a spring gushes out, ending in a pool at his feet. The golden-haired, laurel-crowned youth is nearly full face to the spectator, his left leg slightly drawn under, his right advanced. Partly covering his beautiful body is a lavender robe which slips from his right shoulder and half drapes both thighs. He is playing on a viol, while his upraised head and eyes seem seeking inspiration directly from heaven. Behind him are some laurel-trees, through whose slender trunks and not too heavy foliage the sky, with its soft streaks of cloud, shows clearly. At his right and left are grouped the Muses and poets, a wonderfully simple but most effective arrangement, apparently so naturally accomplished that the necessity for filling up the fan-like space hardly occurs to one. On Apollo's right is Calliope, resting on her left elbow, the upper part of her body turned slightly toward the god, her head in profile away from him. She is in white, entirely robed, except for the right arm and breast. Seated on the other side is Erato, in a light blue gown. She is gazing at Apollo with intense interest expressed in every line. In her left hand she holds the seven-stringed lyre. Behind her are Melpomene and Terpsichore and Polyhymnia, in soft grays and lavenders and greens, in the main fully draped, only an arm or shoulder occasionally escaping from the graceful folds. Between them and the group beside Erato grows the bunch of laurel-trees. Clio, Thalia, and Euterpe are close together, Euterpe turning a little from the other two to speak to Urania, who is standing back to at Erato's feet. She is thus somewhat more fully in the foreground than these others, and her golden-toned gown is caught and held in beautiful big masses, showing off to advantage her stately figure. Below her, in the curving space by the side of the window is a group of laurel-crowned poets. The principal figure here is the splendid Pindar, seated with his right arm outstretched and wonderfully foreshortened. His fine gray-bearded head, with its beautiful large dark eyes, is turned up to the two poets standing beside and above him. Behind these two, finishing the assembly Urania overlooks, are a number of men, some supposed to be contemporaries of Raphael. Vasari speaks of Tebaldeo, Boccaccio, Ariosto, and Sannazaro. But only Ariosto and Boccaccio, whom we have learned to know by traditional types, can be certainly placed now. This cluster is broken again by two of the laurel-trees, and rhythm and movement are given by the varying turns of the heads and shoulders of the poets. On Apollo's right, next to Melpomene, is the figure that, as a compositional unit, balances Urania. Yet, without overthrowing his delicate, unforced balance, Raphael has succeeded in imparting an interest to the noble, blue-robed figure second only to that of Apollo. There is no doubt as to the identity of the majestic being with his grand, Jove-like head. It does not need the sightless eyes to tell us this is the Homer, whom only the god of poetry himself could have inspired. Holding an end of drapery in his left hand, his right is outstretched with the fingers extended, as if he were trying to follow with them the strains of music from the god's violin. He is a remarkably impressive figure. Dante and Virgil are behind him, listening to his ecstatic incantation, while an attractive youth sits below, preparing to write the words the poet sings. Below him, around one tall laurel that breaks the sky behind, is another collection of poets, among whom is Petrarch. Balancing Pindar and also overlapping the window on her side is the seated figure of Sappho. Here once more the painter has given a double twist to the figure that finishes the lines of the composition with fine curves. She sits with feet extended away from the window, while her left arm, leaning on the top of the frame, brings her torso round in an opposite direction. Her head again is turned to look at the poets beside her. The central group of the picture is in a higher, lighter key than the sides, apparently with the intention of differentiating the celestial dwellers from mere earth-born poets. Altogether the fresco shows less feeling than the Disputa and less grandeur than the School of Athens. Yet it is perhaps more pleasing than either. Certain of the figures are, for composition purposes, out of proportion, and the Muses have too small heads for their heavy bodies. As a whole, nevertheless, it has a breadth and freedom that characterise Raphael's greatest period. With the exception of the modern retouching, it is undoubtedly wholly from his hands.

Opposite, over the other window, is the allegory of Prudence, or, as it is usually called, Jurisprudence. This is the least "full" of the four great frescoes of the Camera. Prudence rests upon a pure marble plinth, while on each side of her, sitting on the platform on which are her feet, are Force and Moderation. It covers merely the arched section above the window. In spite of the gloom of the place, Raphael succeeded in getting a wonderful purity and clarity of colour. It is bright and light and gay and spontaneous, with power of line and grace of movement. Prudence, supporting herself on her left hand, is sitting sidewise, her head inclined to the left. A winged boy of lovely shape holds before her a mirror, which she steadies with her hand. Her position is majestic, and her whole outline grand and noble. A mantle hangs from one shoulder and falls about the legs, displaying only the sandalled feet. At the front of the plinth is a graceful boy, holding aloft a flaming torch. Close beside him is Moderation, who is lifting a bridle, and at the same time is turning to gaze at an exquisite naked child facing the spectator. With his hand and finger pointing heavenward, he is emphasising what is everywhere emphasised in this Camera, that it is only from above that all virtue comes. Moderation's full mantle covers her limbs and one of her arms, the sweep of the folds partly hiding the affectation of her pose. On the other side of Prudence is Fortitude, a woman of fuller and richer curves than Moderation. She sits in profile, helmeted, with the ægis on her breast, an ample drapery covering her, one leg encased in armour alone escaping from the folds. Playing with a lion's head with her left hand, she holds in her right an oak branch, recalling the motto of the Rovere. A merry child climbs her lap to pluck the acorns among the leaves. The whole figure is massive, powerful, with stately, determined lines. As if calling attention to this embodiment of government and rule, a boy on the platform at the left, back to, signs to some one out of sight. Raphael here has combined the grace and rhythm of the Greek ideal with the unbounded vigour and energy of Michelangelo. Yet there is no copying of any one. In feeling, this nearly faultless composition is purely Raphaelesque. The colours have the tender gaiety that perhaps he alone knew how to obtain, the foreshortening and lines of the groups are always his, and they are not less masterly than that attained by the worker in the Sistine.

At the sides of the window, below the Jurisprudence, are Emperor Justinian Promulgating the Pandects and Pope Gregory IX. Promulgating the Decretals. The idea of the latter panel Raphael is said to have taken from Melozzo da Forlì's famous fresco, Sixtus IV. Appointing Platina to the Post of Librarian, and which was originally in the Vatican library. In this Julius II. poses as Gregory IX., and with him are the Cardinal Giovanni de' Medici, the future Leo X., Alessandro Farnese, the future Paul III., and another prelate, Antonio del Monte.

The Stanza della Segnatura may be said to represent Raphael as does the Sistine Chapel Michelangelo. Both, perhaps, have individual greater works to their credit. In the Madonna di San Sisto Raphael reached a spiritual height unscaled in the Camera. In the Moses, or the Medicean Marbles, Michelangelo expressed the might and indomitableness of his own soul perhaps even clearer than in the ceiling of the Sistine. But in no other one work is the entire man of each so fully displayed. For clear, shining sanity, the Camera is unexcelled, while the Sistine exerts power and impressiveness attained by no other. In pure beauty and a unique perfection of decorative and mural composition, the Camera must take precedence. In the Sistine it is not beauty so much as it is an overpowering grandeur of conception that strikes one. The two cannot be compared. They are as dissimilar as a deep inland lake dazzling in its glorious shimmering blue and the restless, whirling waves of the ocean itself.

The Stanza della Segnatura leads into the Stanza dell' Incendio on one side and the Stanza d' Eliodoro on the other. Not long after his completion of the Segnatura, Julius ordered Raphael to commence the second chamber of the Stanze. Before he had finished the Eliodoro, Julius had died and Leo X. was Pope. Whatever difference the new reign made politically or ecclesiastically, it was unchanged in its attitude toward Raphael. His work was prized as ever, and the one change seen in the Camera was that now the features of Leo appeared where before would have come those of Julius.

In the ceiling of the Stanza d' Eliodoro, Raphael's hand alone is felt. By the time the wall frescoes are reached, it begins to be apparent that the tremendous amount of work demanded from him, and which he, like artists everywhere, could not refuse, necessitated his giving more and more of the work to his assistants and pupils. Compared with the Segnatura, the Stanza is very simply adorned. Unfortunately, and the why is not thoroughly understood, the ceiling has suffered terribly from a loss and corrosion of colour.

The custom of draping the cold stone palaces with tapestry had come to Italy from the colder north. The Pope apparently had instructed Peruzzi, who was at work before Raphael took his place, to make a design on the ceiling imitating tapestry stretched across it in divisions. Raphael kept to this original intention, and the four principal ceiling compositions look as if they were woven or painted on cloth stretched and tacked to the curved sections between the heavily ornamented ribs that come from the central medallion to the outside border of the ceiling. This centre design has the Pope's escutcheon framed in a round of oak leaves. The borders over the windows have the name and arms of Julius II. twice repeated, supported by angels. Between these are bas-reliefs, in painting, of Roman skirmishes and examples of Friendship, Chastity, Wantonness, Baptism, Prayer, Law, Labour, Force, Childhood, Play, and Study. It is a curious medley of Christian and heathen mythology. Hercules represents strength, for instance; Moses with the tablets, law.

The four ceiling pictures are God's Promise to Noah, Abraham's Sacrifice, Jacob's Dream, and the Burning Bush. Each of these four is directly over one of the four big wall frescoes, and each, by way of analogy, is connected with it. Half obliterated, with the colours almost ruined, these groups, nevertheless, show the highwater mark of Raphael's genius. It has been often said that when the young painter designed them, he had already had a sight of the ceiling of the Sistine. And indeed there can be little question about it, for Michelangelo had uncovered half of it to public view at about the time of the composition of the Camera della Segnatura. The power and vigour and sweep of the figures certainly do suggest the great sculptor-painter, who, influencing others, himself changed only by his own inner thoughts.

In the appearance of God before Noah there is little in that majestic form to remind one of the archaic type in the Disputa. Supported by three angels, he floats through the air a few feet above ground, with his arms held out over Noah, who, kneeling, guards within his arms the clinging Ham. At the doorway beyond and behind Noah is his wife, carrying Japhet over her left shoulder, and turning, to encourage Shem, who is proudly holding a turkey and looking up at his mother. The grace of the children contrasts charmingly with the rugged frame of Noah and the majesty and might of the Eternal.

The Sacrifice of Abraham fills its space less perfectly than is usual in Raphael's compositions. The sacrifice fire on the left of Abraham does not adequately balance the angel floating down with the lamp and the dropped clothes of Isaac on the ground on the other side. Yet Abraham's figure, as he stands with the knife uplifted over the altar where Isaac is bound, is splendidly poised, and has the realism of nature combined with the lines of the Greeks. His lifted arm is stayed by an angel who sweeps across the sky, and below, on the right, is the second angel carrying the lamb.

The massing of Jacob's Dream is much more beautiful. Jacob, dreaming on a pillow of stones, which he tries to soften for his head by resting his arms between, is a finely imagined figure, as he stretches out considerably beyond the half of the picture. From the midst of clouds springs the dream-ladder, going upwards to the left, till it is met by the figure of the Lord, who, seen only to his waist, is enveloped in the billowing clouds. Michelangelo is again suggested in this Jehovah, whose head is much like the Zeus of antiquity. But the most exquisite part of the whole picture is the line of ascending and descending angels. Nothing lovelier than the lowest one can be imagined. With her head thrown up in profile, her hands clasped over her breast, and her beautiful wings spread behind her, she has the grace and holiness of one of Fra Angelico's creations.

The swirl of flames in the Burning Bush has not the dramatic, decorative lines that a modern Vedder would have given. None the less do they portray the mystery and blinding light that make Moses cover his eyes from the sight beyond mortals' ken. The difference between the shepherd, sylvan character of Moses, and the power and dignity of God, surrounded thus with flames and flying cherubs, is remarkably shown. Modern taste, as Crowe and Cavalcaselle rightly observe, which has slighted these four really wonderful compositions, has undoubtedly been influenced to its unjust decision by the state of the frescoes. The original colours have been retouched, the background entirely repainted by Carlo Maratta. The rawness of the edges and the discrepancy between the new and old make the actual sight of these gems almost less valuable and less just than the photographic reproductions of them.

Heliodorus Driven from the Temple, the fresco which gives its name to the room, is a composition, every part of which conforms to the crescent-shaped space on which it is painted. The groups are distributed so that in the centre of the half-circle are the empty steps leading to the temple. The centre of interest, therefore, instead of being the central part of the picture, is here divided evenly between both sides. The balance is exactly maintained, and the result is a composition as unusual in its distribution as it is in its action. Within and between the pillars of the temple that border the central aisle of the edifice, is the altar at which kneels the High Priest Onias. About him are the priests of Aaron, the light from the row of tapers in front of Onias dimly illuming their faces and robes. At the left, on the pavement and steps leading to the Presbytery, is a striking group of worshippers, mostly women and children, who are staring with excited wonder and exclamatory gestures at the rout across the temple. Here, a gold-armoured avenger seated on a rearing horse has thrown to the ground Heliodorus, who vainly tries to protect himself from the plunging fore-feet of the excited animal. He has dropped to the ground the jar full of the stolen treasures, and the golden pieces are spilling all over the pavement. By the side of the dancing horse, gliding over the ground their feet do not actually touch, are the angelic messengers, who, with the scourges in their hands, threaten the two companions of the prostrate chamberlain. The scene in the other half of the picture is very different. Borne on a chair carried by two figures, recognised as portraits of Marcantonio and Giulio Romano, is Julius II., a living type of the victory of the Church.

The state of this fresco is bad, dark, and dull, especially in the right-hand groups. Heliodorus is much injured. A flue of a chimney ran up behind the wall, and caused numberless bad cracks. Though the wall was clamped to prevent damage, many parts of it have been repainted to its exceeding detriment, while other parts have turned muddy and gray and dark. It is supposed that the chief harm was done in 1527, during the Spanish occupation of the palace. It is evident that both Giovanni da Udine and Giulio Romano largely assisted Raphael in this composition.

In effect the Heliodorus is rather dark in tone. Opposite it Raphael placed the glowing Attila, just as on the walls with the windows he balanced the high key of the Mass of Bolsena with the shadows of St. Peter's Prison. The Attila, originally ordered by Julius II., was completed under Leo X., and in the representation of the Pope of the middle ages Raphael immortalised his new patron. The fresco shows the horde of Huns filling more than half the crescent. In the middle, mounted on his war-horse, richly robed and crowned, is Attila himself, gazing terror-struck at the vision in the flaming sky. In his consternation he has flung his arms to the left, and both his horse and the white charger, shown in the right foreground, are as frightened as their riders. They pause and rear and snort, giving splendid lines and positions for the master's brush. The white steed, in the present state of the fresco, where so much is unduly blackened, comes out rather too strongly for the perfect harmony of the composition, but in itself is a wonderful example of a wildly excited, nobly proportioned animal, magnificently seated by the corsleted, helmeted figure. All about are the hordes, some mounted, some on foot, all evincing fearful fright. The daring poses of beast and man add to the intense breathlessness of the scenes. At the left of the centre are two warriors facing each other, whose splendid forms, massive muscles, and fine grouping are one of the best bits in the whole picture. The extreme left is taken by Leo on his famous white palfrey, his ringed hand raised, as if calling upon Heaven's intervention. Dignity, assurance, repose are the strongest characteristics of this portrait face, with its puffy flesh, keen and protruding eye. Above, in the sky, are St. Peter and St. Paul, the vision called forth by the Pope, and which has resulted in the stampede of the enemy. Both hold swords, Peter carrying besides the keys. They are conceived with a grandeur of form and impressive appearance that, though not suggesting the actual shapes of Michelangelo, at least express the power his figures always conveyed. Beyond, in the left distance, against a glowing sky are the lines of the aqueduct and the Colosseum. The Pope is surrounded with his churchmen, and one of the cardinals is a duplicate of his own face. This was because the fresco was begun when Leo X. was still cardinal, and the Pope was intended to be a representation of Julius II. The riotous movement of the composition is admirably if somewhat arbitrarily balanced by the quiet, solemn group of the Church and the saints in the sky. Power, all through, — that is perhaps the strongest impression it conveys. It is not all by the hand of Raphael, this, as well as the Heliodorus, plainly showing the marks of his assistants. It has been retouched, also, to its great harm, and the ground is badly injured by corrosion of the plaster.

Over the window opposite the Mass of Bolsena is the Deliverance of Peter. It is as simple in its construction as the Heliodorus and Attila are complex. There are even less figures than in the Bolsena. Of the four it is perhaps the one that most appeals to the modern spectator. The sentiment of it is wonderfully, beautifully, expressed. Directly over the window is the prison itself, clearly indicated by the barred door and the heavy framing pillars. Leading down from both sides of the window are the steps of the prison, where the guards are sleeping. Within the bars where Peter lies manacled and connected by chains to his two guards, is the angel bending over the prostrate saint. The glory that fills the gloom of the prison seems really of celestial origin. Its soft effulgence does not partake of the mundane. At the same time the original darkness of the dungeon is hinted at in the atmosphere that surrounds the light. Three of the guards on the steps at the left of the prison are roused from their sleep by a startled soldier, who points to the prison as he strides upward. In the sky the heavy clouds part about the crescent moon, answering the flaring torch that the soldier carries. On the other side, holding by the hand the dazed and wondering Peter, the angel, still with something of the glory that flooded the prison, is leading the released safely down by the two guards deep in the heaven-sent sleep. The angel here is supposed to be mostly untouched and to be wholly Raphael's work. The grace and curve of the figure, the benignity of the face, the lightness of the poise, contrasted with the duller, heavier, half-realising Peter, all are wonderfully portrayed. The way also in which the light strikes different bits of the steel armours has a realistic incisiveness not often acquired. Technically, such a presentation of different moments of time in the one composition is a transgression of the laws of composition. Actually, in spite of a certain theatric quality, Raphael's success in thus presenting them proved his superiority to, and his right to disregard, what rules did not serve his immediate purpose. As an effect in chiaroscuro he has perhaps never surpassed it. The most injured parts are the figure of Peter, and the guards asleep on the right-hand steps. The angel in the cell is also badly corroded, and has been repainted in spots, and the landscape and sky on the left have been almost entirely modernised.

The Miracle of Bolsena was painted in remembrance of a legend of the thirteenth century of an unbelieving priest, who, while officiating, suddenly saw drops of blood issuing from the Host. In the fresco the features of Urban IV. are no longer his. Julius II. has taken his place. He kneels at one end of the altar, which is the centre of the picture, his elbows resting upon a cushioned stool. Opposite him is the priest lifting a wafer marked with the cross, and from which drops of blood are falling. Behind him, on a level, are the acolytes with their lighted tapers. This group is placed in front of a screen, dividing them from the nave of a church whose receding pillars are seen over their heads. Low down, behind the Pope, are two cardinals and two prelates, and still lower, on the ground, are the liveried bearers, gazing up at the miracle. Their rich costumes give a fine spot of colour to the foreground. In the other half the congregation watch the amazing sight with excited gestures or quiet interest, while leaning over the screen behind the priest are two men, one pointing out the miracle to the other. This composition is supposed to be almost entirely from Raphael's own hand. The purity and transparence of the colour, the exquisite finish of the modelling, along with the subtle variety in each personage, are unequalled by any other fresco in the room. Unequalled, one may say, by any other fresco in the world. There is in this, too, no trace of the influence of Michelangelo which is so often evident in many of the other paintings. Rather, as Crowe and Cavalcaselle have noted, it carries one back to the portrait work of Domenico Ghirlandajo, or to the breadth of treatment and massive distribution of Masaccio. Added, is a Venetian glow and depth of colour. The scheme of colour, nevertheless, by which the principals are thrown into light, higher tones against the dark screen, is peculiarly Raphaelesque, as well as is the manner in which the groups below are in the darker tones, relieved by richness of garb rather than by effect of light.

If the two larger wall paintings of the Stanza d' Eliodoro had been as fully executed by the master's brush as the two smaller, the room, it is safe to say, would have been a greater monument to his genius, even, than the Camera della Segnatura. As it is, though in spots he rises in the Eliodoro to heights, especially in technique, above the level of the other, taken altogether the first room of the series still ranks as a more perfect ensemble.

Among the other painters whom Raphael had displaced in the Vatican was Perugino, his old master. Perhaps out of respect, perhaps from lack of time to create new, he left unchanged the ceiling decoration of the latter in the Stanza dell' Incendio. It is not important decoration, even for Perugino, and there is an immeasurable distance between these "tondi" and the ceiling of the Eliodoro. There is, nevertheless, a certain charm about these frescoes of saints and angels that recall some of the more delicate and spiritual works of the Perugian.

Of the four wall paintings by far the best is the one from which the room receives its name, — the Incendio del Borgo. It was designed to commemorate the fire that took place in the Saxon quarter of Rome in the seventh century, and which Leo

IV. is said to have put out by making the sign of the cross.

In the centre, at the back of the composition in the Portico of St. Peter's, is the Pope, with the features of Leo X. An excited crowd swarm below him on the top of the wide steps, while below, on each side, are the burning ruins. On the right the people are carrying water in jars and pouring it upon the flames, not yet conscious that the pontiff's efforts are to still the raging fire. On the other side they are beyond making any attempt at killing the conflagration. Their whole efforts are directed toward saving their lives. One is climbing down the wall, another is dropping a child into arms below, a son is carrying a father off on his shoulders. In the foreground an hysterical mob of women and children kneel and supplicate the Holy Father, duplicated by another such crowd in the distance nearer St. Peter's. This latter crowd, by the way, is one of the best balanced and composed parts of the whole fresco. Connecting the central foreground group with the fire extinguishers on the right is a woman who drives her naked children before her, while she hurries along, carrying their clothes on her arms. Taken as a whole, perhaps there is more variety of position, more life and novelty of grouping, than in almost any of the other frescoes. The extraordinary amount of concentrated interest in each part, however, has led to an accumulation of points of focus. Leo is too far in the background to be anything more than the literary centre. Of the other groups there is a different interest attaching to the two water-bearing damsels on the right than there is to the praying group in the centre, or the man scaling the wall on the left, or the one borne on his son's shoulders. Diverse as these groups are, they are of equal prominence in placing, and one's eye wanders over the wall without finding a central point of rest. There is no doubt but Raphael was here largely assisted by his pupils, and it is to them most of the exaggerations, the attitudinising, the spreading of arms, and the coarse lines must be credited. Yet there is nevertheless a grand manner in it all, and Raphael's powerful conception is plainly felt, even under the most careless of assistants' brushes. The state of the fresco is bad. One fissure runs down obliquely through the centre, and the ground has been repainted in spots as well as the sky.

INCENDIO DI BORGO

By Raphael; in the Stanze

Raphael is not nearly so strongly felt in the other three frescoes of the room. Here he frankly turned over most of the labours to his aides, and satisfied himself with merely a cursory superintendence. It is not to be wondered at that they fall far below the standard of the great Urbinate.

Historically the Coronation of Charlemagne represents the presentation of the crown of the empire to the King of the Franks by Leo III. In the fresco Leo III. has become Leo X., and Charlemagne is Francis I. Here, even the faces of the king and pontiff show no sign of the master's hand. The scene was depicted as taking place in St. Peter's, as it was in its half-built state. Consequently there are seen about many hangings and draperies, used to cover the ruins and unfinished walls. Considering the mixed-up setting, it is remarkable that Raphael got, or constrained his pupils to get, the concord that is shown here. In the middle distance, slightly at the left, sits Leo, on his draped throne, holding with both hands the crown he is about to place on the head of the kneeling Charlemagne. All around are gathered the cardinals, and it is in these, each almost identically robed, and all close together, where Raphael's own brush shows. Every individual head is a personal study in its turn, line, and expression. The extreme left of the foreground is occupied by the bearers of the heavy silver gifts of Charlemagne. Over their heads a part of a gallery shows choir-boys watching the proceedings. The state of the fresco is injured, both by repainting and by abrasion. The heavy, opaque shadows are due to the restorer's hand.

The Oath of Pope Leo, on the other window wall, is also largely by Raphael's assistants, but still showing the fine conception, the magnificent massing and space-filling, always characteristics of Raphael. In the centre over the window is the altar, Leo behind it, with his hand on the open book, gazing heavenward. At his right shoulder is the mitre-bearer, and beside him stands a cardinal, who is lifting Leo's embroidered mantle. The rest of the cardinals stand in a semicircle round the altar. At the back, raised, a clerk holds the crown of Charlemagne, while the king himself is upright, nearly back to, his head in profile, dressed like a Roman patrician, with a magnificent gold chain on his shoulders. He is pointing to the Pope. On each side of this scene steps lead to the ground, where are mace-bearers and some of the military following of the Pope. The fresco is faded and repainted so much that parts about the window are almost wholly gone.

On the remaining unbroken wall is the Battle of Ostia, representing Leo X. as Leo IV., after the so-called miraculous annihilation of the Saracen galleys, when, in 846, they threatened Ostia. The storm which arose, scattering and destroying their fleet, was supposed to be due wholly to the prayers of the Pope. The distance shows the ships of the Saracens, where the battle is still raging. Some of these battle-ships are in the bay, away from the shore, others are apparently alongside the landing of a sort of tower-like octagonal building that connects an open-arched portal with other walls and buildings. Here, in front of the archway, a party of the enemy is landed from a small boat. In the foreground the prisoners are being hauled on shore and led captive to the Pope, who sits at the left raised on a block of marble. Behind him are the cardinals, Giulio de' Medici and Bibbiena, and all about him are members of his suite. With uplifted hands and ecstatic face the Pope is blessing Heaven for this victory to the Christians. Below, at his feet, his captains are hauling the captive Saracens before him. In the groupings of these struggling, suffering nude figures, Raphael has marvellously displayed his complete knowledge of the human form. They are being stabbed, pierced, trampled upon, by their victors. Out of the boat on the right, two of them, with their hands bound behind, are being dragged to shore by their hair. Everywhere torture, injury, frightful hurt, — and it affects the Pope not at all. He apparently regards all the agonies inflicted upon the heathen prisoners as merely the just decree of Heaven, — the Christians being only the instruments of divine wrath. Raphael has made the Saracens a fierce, barbarous looking race, evidently for dramatic emphasis of the differences between them and their captors. The Pope's portrait is probably from his own hand, as well as the two cardinals behind him. All three show Raphael at the very amplitude of his powers. The fresco is badly restored, blackened, and cracked. Several large fissures have made their appearance through the most important of the groups, and a number of the figures have been repainted many times. Even the faces of the Pope and the two cardinals and the crucifix-bearer have been hurt to a tremendous degree by retouching and patching. All the prisoners forced to their knees before the pontiff are in a lamentable condition.

The last of the three rooms which can really claim Raphael as creator, the Stanza dell' Incendio, is also the last of the three in point of achievement. The tendencies to exaggeration and unrestraint that are of occasional appearance in the Eliodoro are here almost an integral part of every fresco. Freedom and variety of movement have often degenerated into contortions and calculated posings, the "grand manner" has become dangerously like pomposity. Yet, as the American editors of Vasari say, "under and behind the exaggeration and the coldness is still the superb power of the Renaissance; we are yet close to the life-giving force of Raphael."

In the Hall of Constantino, the last of the Stanze that was to have even a word of direction from the great master, there is extremely little to show his part in the work. The Defeat of Maxentius contains slight signs of the original studies by Raphael, the others almost none.

Two-thirds of this fresco are filled with the rush of the victor with his army through the ranks of his enemy, Maxentius lying head foremost and lifeless on the Tiber bank. Constantine, with his spear poised, has come safe through. Everywhere the steeds are galloping, struggling, kicking, or being stricken down. Men are fighting hand to hand, with here and there some one carrying off a dead friend. The emperor meanwhile presses on, trampling over his foes. Above the battle-ground angels are hovering, guarding Constantine, and assuring him victory.

The Vision of the Cross on the wall of egress shows Constantine upon a rostrum, in the middle of his camp. In the heavens above, surrounded by a golden glory, three angels bear a cross and advance toward a dragon-like monster who writhes in contortions, at their approach. A rush of soldiers and people before Constantine with battle standards flying and shields and spears flashing show that they, too, see the vision. Near the emperor stands his lieutenant, and at the extreme right a dwarf grins and prances as he tries on a helmet much too large. The landscape is full of the ruins of ancient Rome.

Giulio Romano, largely responsible for these last two, is probably also the author of the Baptism of Constantine. The scene is laid in the Basilica of San Giovanni Laterano. The principal figures are grouped on a circular flight of steps. At their foot Constantine is kneeling, nearly unrobed, while the Pope Sylvester pours the water over him. The pontiff has his left hand on the Gospels held up to him by an acolyte. Near by, all kneeling, are a servant with cloths, a deacon with a salver, and a page with the emperor's breastplate, sword and helmet. Behind are various other attendants and prelates. At the left is a bearded man in sixteenth-century dress, whom Vasari says is a portrait of Nicolò Vespucci, the favourite of Clement VII. It is possible that the sketch for this may have been by Raphael.

Last of the four principal frescoes is the Cession of Rome to the Papacy. The Pope, enthroned in the old basilica of St. Peter, is receiving from the kneeling Constantine a golden statuette. The usual number of prelates, cardinals, and officials are grouped about, while the Swiss Guard restrains the crowd. On the high altar are relics of St. Peter and St. Paul, and under the pillars on the right is one whom tradition says is Giulio Romano, and on the left Baldassare Castiglione. Kneeling or playing on the foreground are women and children. This is so poorly executed that only the arrangement and distribution of figures is supposed to be by Giulio Romano. It is thought that his assistant Raphael del Colle did almost all of it.

The Stanza di Constantino was hardly even planned when Raphael died. The only two figures completed were Justice and Comity. They were executed in oil, and were put in as experiments by Raphael. When Clement VII. came to Rome taste had returned to straight fresco. The two figures are both beautiful, showing many touches of Raphael's own hand. The scheme of the whole was to represent the frescoes as if they were painted upon tapestry that hung about the walls. This necessitated the rich borderings and the imitations of niches, with figures in relief, or of detached statues all about.

On the ceiling of the hall are various pictures by Tommaso Laureti and Antonio Scavati, under the orders of Sixtus V. They are exceedingly ornate, but not of great artistic importance. Raphael dead, there was no one to take his place. His pupils could only imitate him, and never at his best. No more striking proof of the futility of their efforts could be found than to compare the Stanza di Constantino with any one of the other three. Michelangelo still lived, but the Renaissance was already dying.

CHAPTER VI.

RAPHAEL'S LOGGIE

AFTER Bramante's death, Raphael reconstructed one of the great architect's famous Vatican loggie, and built a third. It is with the one that, to save from becoming a premature ruin, he strengthened and supported, that the painter's name is most universally associated. For more than four hundred years this long, delicate corridor overlooking the Court of St. Damasus has been known best as Raphael's Bible. When one considers that the Bible scenes which have given it this name occupy a very small space in the midst of a decoration that covers the whole of the vaulting, the pilasters, and the walls of the loggie, one realises that it is what may be called the literary side of the painter's art which gives it fame to the world at large. Nevertheless it is the purely decorative portions of this wonderful whole that generations of less gifted decorators, designers and architects have found a mine inexhaustible in suggestion, fancy, and charm.

The gallery is divided into thirteen compartments, so to speak, by twelve pillars and pilasters, the vaulting of each of these divisions being a square, domed cupola. This roofing is entirely covered with an ornamentation that encircles and separates four rectangle or hexagonal spaces, placed one on each side of the square that converges into the dome. It is in these fifty-two small interspaces where are painted the series of Biblical pictures. Bordering them, filling the angles and curves of the dome, in the walling between the pilasters, on the faces of pillar and pilaster, around the entrances, on the embrasures of the windows, everywhere, leaving not an uncovered inch, are stucco-work and monochromes imitating reliefs, grotesques, wreaths of fruit and flowers, birds, children, landscapes, fishes, musical instruments, beasts, all kinds of conventionalised animals, reptiles, fanciful arabesques, and scrolls, — all painted in the brightest and gayest of colours. So bright that even to-day, in spite of weather and time, and in spite of the fact that flakes of the plaster are continually sifting down, — with an ultimate and sure ruin as consequence, — even to-day the gay freshness of the tones is a marvel and delight. The designs themselves, in their spontaneous fertility of invention, their fantastical originality, their exuberance of colour, and a very abandon of richness and floridity, yet are so combined and made into such a perfect ensemble that there is not a hint of useless or overdone exaggeration in part or whole. To attempt any adequate description of this ornamentation would require many volumes. Volpato and Ottaviani during the eighteenth century started to make them well known through engravings, but stopped long before they had completed the work.

The stimulus for decoration of this character was doubtless found in the excavations of ancient Rome, especially in the baths of the emperors, where wall paintings were full of quaint grotesques of all kinds. But these loggie of Raphael surpass not only all Roman excavations, but they conform more perfectly and yet more originally to the spirit of ancient art than do even the best of the long-after discovered walls of Pompeii.

Up to the beginning of the nineteenth century the whole corridor was open to wind and weather. At that time it was concluded worth while to take some ordinary precautions for the preservation of this priceless heritage, and forthwith the open arcades were furnished with windows.

Although these loggie are always given Raphael's name, as a matter of fact he himself painted not one stroke of them. It is even claimed that he did not so much as make the original drawing for any part. Vasari states that he gave the stucco-work and painting of the grotesques to Giovanni da Udine, that of the figures to Giulio Romano, who, however, did not do many of them. This last is probably a mistake. Giulio unquestionably had a very large share in the work. With these two noted pupils of Raphael were also associated Perino del Vaga, Penni, Pellegrino da Modena, Vincenzo da San Gimignano, Polidoro da Caravaggio, and Bologna. Yet, though Raphael's hand is nowhere actually seen, his mind and spirit everywhere are. At the time when the loggie were painted, toward the close of 1517, Raphael was surrounded with a corp of assistants who were to him like so many extra hands. So well did they understand his methods and ways of working that, it has been conjectured, he needed only to indicate hastily with a few determined strokes the main points of a composition. The best of his co-workers were then able to transfer it to wall or canvas, practically as the master had conceived it. Practically, that is, so far as the distribution of mass, general scheme of chiaroscuro, main dependence and interdependence of figures, in groups or singly. Beyond this, they could go only so far as their individual talents would let them. The result of it all is a magnitude of work passing under Raphael's name with much of which his brush never came in contact. In almost every case, however, it is saved from mediocrity, and often is raised to highest artistic value by the compelling power of the genius that was the source of the inspiration behind the brush work. Without question, the loggie would be more beautiful if Raphael had painted them. There would never have been the sometimes unpleasant brick reds now in the figures, nor the heavy, often coarse, outlines, and certain crudities of colour and uncertainties of expression would surely have been very different under the harmonious and vivid touch of the Urbinate's hand. But if Raphael had executed these frescoes, the world in consequence would have lost many other of the precious works better worthy of his genius. And even as it now is, this composite work of Raphael's aids ranks high among the great wall decorations of the world. It is not too much to say that hardly any other surpasses it in an ingenuous gaiety, a fresh splendour, and, in the scenes themselves, in a simple directness that is noble in its simplicity, and wonderfully dramatic in its pictorial treatment.

Of the fifty-two small frescoes in the thirteen bays, in general it may be said that they almost literally translate the Bible words they illustrate. Yet so natural, unforced, inevitable are the compositions, that they seem not at all constrained by the subject. They appear to have been designed wholly with the decorative point of view in mind. The simplicity and straightforwardness in the telling of each story is very unlike the way in which Michelangelo filled his pictures with symbolical allusions and conceptions, which, full of spiritual significance as they may be, often cause confusion in the observer's mind. Raphael chose scenes specially adapted to pictorial representation, while Michelangelo, even when he took up his palette and brushes, could never free himself from the claims of sculpture. The surroundings of these scenes were so rich and varied that Raphael saw at once the paintings ought to be most marked for coherence, sobriety, and clarity. Like Ghiberti, he rendered each story with as few figures as possible, — making each thereby depend for its dramatic value upon the intensity of the moment described. So great a result with so few means has never been excelled. Of the most beautiful, perhaps, are Joseph Interpreting Pharaoh's Dream, Building of the Ark, The Angel's Visit to Abraham, Moses Striking the Rock, Interview of Isaac and Rebecca with Abimelech. In two of the frescoes it is easy to trace Raphael's indebtedness to other masters. Michelangelo's influence can be felt in the Creation, Masaccio's in Adam and Eve Driven from Paradise. In all the others, he relies not at all upon artistic tradition, but solely upon the text of the Bible. The subjects of the thirteen bays are as follows:

The first gives four views of the Creation of the World: God Divides Light from Darkness; He Separates Land and Sea; Forms Sun and Moon, and Creates the Animals.

Second Bay — Story of Adam and Eve: Creation of Eve; The Fall; Exile from Eden; Labours of Adam and Eve.

Third Bay — Story of Noah: Building of the Ark; Deluge; Coming Forth from the Ark; Noah's Sacrifice.

Fourth Bay — Story of Abraham: Abraham and Melchizedek; Covenant of God with Abraham; Angel's Visit to Abraham; Flight of Lot.

Fifth Bay — Story of Isaac: God Appears to Isaac; Isaac Embracing Rebecca; Isaac Blessing Jacob; Esau Claiming the Blessing.

Sixth Bay — Story of Jacob: Jacob's Ladder; Jacob and Rachel; Jacob Asking for Rachel's Hand; Flight from Laban.

Seventh Bay — Story of Joseph: Joseph Telling His Dream to His Brothers; Joseph Sold into Egypt; Joseph and Potiphar's Wife; Joseph before Pharaoh.

Eighth Bay — Story of Moses: Finding of Moses; Burning Bush; Passage of Red Sea; Moses Striking the Rock.

Ninth Bay — Story of Moses, continued: Moses Receives the Tables of the Law; Worship of Golden Calf; Moses Breaks the Tables; Moses Before the Pillar of Cloud.

Tenth Bay — Story of Joshua: Israelites Cross the Jordan; Fall of Jericho; Joshua Stays the Course of the Sun; Division of the Promised Land.

Eleventh Bay — Story of David: David Anointed King of Israel; David and Goliath; Triumph of David; David and Bathsheba.

Twelfth Bay — Story of Solomon: Consecration of Solomon; Judgment of Solomon; Queen of Sheba; Building of the Temple.

Thirteenth Bay — Story of Christ: Adoration of Shepherds; Adoration of Magi; Baptism of Christ; Last Supper.

In the first compartment perhaps the best of the four scenes is the Separation of Sea and Land. This little fresco — and it is to be remembered that in all these scenes the figures are only about a foot high — is wonderfully fine, of pure Raphaeleic character. Hovering in the air over the globe, with flying, splendidly massed draperies, is the Almighty, his right hand pointing to the division of the land and sea, his right forefinger resting upon a point of land that projects into the water. A group of trees partly hidden by the curve of the sphere gives the finishing touch to a composition as simple as it is dramatic and full of fire and imagination. The colours are remarkably preserved, and almost it seems good enough to be by Raphael himself.

The beautiful landscape in the Creation of Eve

STORY OF ADAM AND EVE
In Raphael's Loggie

has become sadly demoralised by abrasion. Here the Eternal is a man gray with age, wrapped in a heavy mantle. His left hand is upon Eve's shoulder, who, nude, stands in a beseeching attitude, her head inclined to Adam, who is sitting upon a bank and pointing to the place of his missing rib.

It is the expulsion from Eden that recalls Masaccio in Florence. The angel, sword in hand, descends a flight of steps, driving the two sinners before him. Adam, covering his face with his hands, is fairly pushed along by the angel's touch on his shoulder. Eve, whose too heavy shape is distinctive of Giulio, goes forward with lighter, more expectant tread. It is not difficult to fancy an excited interest in her countenance as she faces the unknown before her. The light strikes the front of the angel's robe, and lines the upper curve of his wing with fine effect. This effect is intensified by the shadow that glooms about the two in front, and is answered in the landscape, which behind and beyond them is bathed in light. Unfortunately, the angel's face is mostly sunk into oblivion, it is so badly abraded. The landscape, too, is discoloured.

In the third arcade, Noah, standing by the mighty framework of the ark, and the workmen whom he is superintending are forcibly contrasted. The builders are rough, burly workmen, Noah a figure of dignity, and with a commanding bearing increased by the noble lines of his full drapery.

The story of Abraham is graphically told, especially where Melchizedek and his people bring bread and wine to the patriarch. In the foreground centre are the large and beautifully shaped wine-jugs. At the side of one stands Melchizedek, graciously presenting them. Abraham, in a Roman helmet and arms, with a lance over his shoulder, directs the movements of the slaves carrying the baskets of bread, at the same time acknowledging to Melchizedek the welcomeness of their arrival. The group is completed by attendants on each side offering and accepting the gifts. It is much damaged, and in many places has lost its colour. Yet it is distinctly Raphaeleic in the grouping and balance, and the form of Melchizedek recalls St. Paul and the apostles in the cartoons.

Lot, Abandoning Sodom, strides along in the foreground, a hand in each of his daughters'. Slightly behind is his wife, just turning for the fatal backward look. Arrested as she is stepping forward, already the change from flesh to mineral has begun. She is painted as if she were of alabaster. The light strikes the group squarely in front, throwing shadows under their feet. The figures are spirited in movement, but somewhat heavy and clumsy in line.

In the bay devoted to Isaac, one of the frescoes shows the Almighty stretched upon a whirl of clouds, his figure and flying robes suggesting him of the Sistine. With his left arm reaching far out, he warns Isaac, who kneels in the foreground, not to undertake the journey into Egypt. At the left, under a tree, sits Rebecca. Isaac is modelled on the antique, his round cap rather like that of Mercury, but his limbs are too heavy for the fleet god. There is a grand undulating landscape of trees and grass leading to the distance, where a castle on a hill and a chain of mountains break the sky-line.

Isaac Blessing Jacob shows the old father on his couch, the upper part of his figure nude. He is splendidly drawn, with a fine head whose white beard and hair give him the appearance of a Greek philosopher. At the foot kneel Jacob and Rebecca and three sons, while at the door enters Esau. In comparison with the patriarch, the others are poorly executed. The painting of this is assigned to Penni.

Jacob's Dream is differently conceived from the one in the Camera. The ladder is here directly in the centre, at the very top of which is the Lord, with arms wide outspread. Clouds effectually conceal the sides as well as the top and bottom of the ladder. Jacob lies on the ground, his head turned so that, if his eyes opened, he could see the double line of ascending and descending angels. The composition is possibly more graceful than the one in the Camera, but the figure of Jacob is better drawn and has more nobility in the latter. In this of the loggie, the chiaroscuro is extremely happy, particularly effective being the figure of the Almighty, relieved against a bright light that then merges into the darkness of the encircling clouds. The picture is well preserved.

In the Meeting of Rachel and Jacob at the Well, where a flock of sheep is drinking, Rachel, as well as the young girl beside her, has a grace and suppleness foreshadowing the later Italian art.

Two very good panels are in the division devoted to Joseph. Where he is telling his dream to his brothers, he is shown in the midst of an Oriental landscape, a flock of sheep on the extreme right, his brothers sitting and standing about him. Against the sky above are two disks upon which the dreams are painted. Joseph is delicately, even effeminately, formed, his charming grace in vivid contrast to the ruggedness of the others. The groups of these are skilfully balanced, and well indicate their surprise, indignation, and envy as they listen. The three standing with locked arms, nearly back to, are especially noteworthy for distribution of light and shade.

Again the subject is a dream. This time Joseph is interpreting for Pharaoh. Within a room whose two arcade openings look on to a pastoral scene, Joseph, with the courtiers grouped behind him, stands before the king. Pharaoh, sunken in thought, sits in profile at the left, his hand feeling his beard. The dreams are again painted upon the conventional disks above the arcades. There is a certain looseness of massing here, at variance with Raphael's manner. The best part, perhaps, is the group of courtiers.

The Finding of Moses is at the moment when a couple of maids of Pharaoh's daughter have just drawn the cradle to the shore. Two of them are bending over it, while the baby reaches out his arms in delight. A number of maidens behind are looking on with great surprise, while the princess stands with her hands outspread, much kindness in face and manner. Beyond, the sun is setting behind the low hills that slope to the water's edge, lighting with its reflection this well-composed group. Vasari claims it to be wholly Giulio's composition.

The Passage of the Red Sea shows the last of the fleeing Israelites crawling on to the land. At the extreme end of all, Moses, with his wand, is directly in front of the pillar of fire. The chariots and horses of the Egyptians have fallen victims to the waves. Parts of this composition have the dignity and impressiveness of scenes from the Sistine. But the less compact build of the whole, and the more literal transference of studies from the antique, show that Raphael's hand was needed here to give it that vivi-fying touch with which he could bring untoward elements into glorious unity. It has, however, great movement.

The positions of the many heads of the kneeling or dancing Israelites about the Golden Calf are perhaps the most skilful parts of this picture. There is great diversity, not alone in the way the heads are turned or bent, but also in their features and expressions.

Moses Showing the Tablets of Law to the Children of Israel is a finely conceived picture, with a dramatic arrangement of light and shade. Standing before his prostrate people, Moses holds the tablets in front of him, three of his elders by his side. The power and grandeur of his face are striking. The light that splashes over the backs of his attending priests, and leaves the rest of their bodies in shadow, is duplicated by equally strongly marked effects in the crowd in front. One of the most vigorously drawn is the youth kneeling in the foreground, his hands resting upon his staff.

It is the moment just before the cavalcade leaves the dry land that is illustrated in the scene called the Transfer of the Ark through the Jordan. The precious Tabernacle, a wooden construction of about the shape of the toy arks of nursery days, is carried by priests and escorted by the band of Israelites extending in a curving line beyond. A man in feathered helmet, with rather exaggerated proportions, turns to direct them. At the other side is a seated river god of antique lines, indicating the miraculous opening for the passage. Joshua, in the middle of the foot columns on a white horse, raises his joined hands to heaven in prayer. The colours of this scene are harmonious, in a light key. The painting is undoubtedly by Perino del Vaga.

There are reminiscences of the Battle of Ostia in the one called Joshua Commanding the Sun to Stand Still, without, however, the splendid control of the thing as a whole. It is, nevertheless, an exciting scene of carnage, done with sufficient abandon fully to show the onslaught of the victorious and the agony of the defeated. Joshua, on his white charger, rides with far-flung arms, demanding the sun on one side and the moon on the other to obey his behests. Youth and force are expressed in his alert face and impetuous movement. Perino del Vaga is again assigned as author.

One of the very best of the frescoes attributed to this painter is the Triumph of David. David, in his chariot, follows his captive prisoners, one, a captain, with his hands bound behind him at the chariot's wheel. Back of them are the Israelites, headed by a plumed leader. David carries his harp with him, and his mien is that of a serious, deeply thoughtful sage, rather than that of a victorious warrior. The two horses of the chariot, which largely fill the foreground, are drawn with much spirit and fire.

Of the Solomon arcade, the Reception of the Queen of Sheba is perhaps the most satisfactory. The character and build of several of the figures are more suggestive of Giulio Romano than of Perino del Vaga. Solomon, stepping from his throne, meets with welcoming hands the queen, who is already flying up the steps, while behind her are her slaves, heavily laden with presents. The movement is somewhat forced and theatric. The unqueenlike rush and flying draperies of her of Sheba are amusingly naïve. Yet the figures are well done, the king at the right of the throne, standing back to, and the kneeling slave emptying a basin of coins upon the floor being particularly felicitous. There is, too, more cohesion in the grouping than is usual with Perino del Vaga.

In the last arcade, the Nativity and the Adoration of the Magi are the best. The composition of the latter is much like that in the second series of the tapestries, but has, possibly, a better unity of feeling. The kneeling Madonna under the oblong window, through which angels are throwing flowers and blessings on those below, has a Tuscan charm that is emphasised by the bright if now disappearing colours. The Epiphany is more solid, constructive, and perhaps more Raphaeleic in treatment. In fact, however, the whole of the last three arcades, compared with the others, show much less coherence of design, charm of feeling, and knowledge of technique.

CHAPTER VII.

RAPHAEL'S TAPESTRIES

THE Galleria degli Arazzi is one division of one of the long galleries built by Bramante to connect the Vatican proper with the Belvedere. Here, on both sides of the badly lighted corridor, hang, among others, the ten tapestries called the Acts of the Apostles, the cartoons for which rank among the greatest of Raphael's works.

While the young painter from Urbino was decorating the Stanze, Leo X. issued a new order. At this time St. Peter's was still in such an unfinished, unroofed condition that during inclement weather it could not be used. On such occasions the ceremonies took place in the Sistine Chapel, that being by far the largest sanctuary in the Vatican. Paris de Grassis, who was in charge on such occasions, was continually forced to invent new decorations for celebrating mass at the death of a cardinal, or for a reception of deputations and foreign envoys. It occurred to him that a set of tapestries to hang below the wall frescoes on each side of the chapel would make a more beautiful and more appropriate ornamentation than any he could devise. Up to this time Raphael had had no hand in the adornment of this, the principal chapel in the very heart of Latin Christendom. Possibly the knowledge of Bramante's earlier desire to have his young friend there represented may have influenced the Pope in his choice of painter for the work. At all events, about 1514, Raphael began the cartoons, which were finished by 1516. He was paid one hundred ducats apiece. As fast as each cartoon was completed, it was despatched from the master's atelier to the weavers in Brussels. Thus neither Vasari nor the Roman public in general ever really saw the original drawings. Strictly speaking, these cartoons, seven of which are now in the South Kensington Museum in London, are drawings rather than paintings. The colour is only lightly and slightly indicated. In spite of the grandeur given by brilliant tones with the interwoven gold and silver threads, it is the cartoons instead of the tapestries that rank higher in the art of the world. For in not a single one of the weavings did the Flemish painters in thread succeed in reproducing the delicate shades of expression and subtle indications of type and character that are such potent factors for beauty in all the cartoons. It is estimated that the weaving took about three or four years. In December, 1519, seven of them were put on the chapel walls, and the whole series was hung in 1520. This was an extraordinary feat, and is evidence of some sharp pressure put upon the Brussels workmen. Under Louis XIV., at the Gobelins, they required more than ten years to weave a set of about equal labour, — the History of the King, still to be seen at the Garde Meuble National in Paris.

The tapestries have passed through many strange vicissitudes. At the death of Leo X. they were pawned for five thousand ducats. During the sack of Rome in 1527, they were treated to all kinds of indignities, the Punishment of Elymas still showing where it was cut in two to sell more easily. Two went as far as Constantinople, and all were sold by the soldiers of De Bourbon. In 1545 the Vatican managed again to get possession of them. In 1798 the French sold them to a company of dealers, and they were exhibited in Paris. Once more Pius VII. purchased them, and in 1808 they were returned to Rome, and ever since have hung in the palace of the Popes.

As has been often said, Raphael violated every law of tapestry decoration in his designs for these magnificent specimens of "arazzi." But, as usual, his genius, riding over every conventional restriction, succeeded in producing a series of stupendous, monumental, historical compositions. As our American editors of Vasari have excellently said, "In spite of sprawling fingers, writhing toes, and rolling eyes, and in spite, too, of a lack of subtle characterisation which makes many of these figures academic, their movements are grand." Of the cartoons, they remark that they "are, as compositions, almost perfect. Although the pantomime is exaggerated, the story is told clearly and simply . . . with a directness and force unrivalled since Giotto, with the new science of the great epoch, and with a freedom from mysticism which made them especially comprehensible."

Vasari states that when the tapestries arrived, they "awakened astonishment in all who beheld them." But it was the depth and richness of the colouring and their decorative qualities more than their higher artistic worth that appealed to those early observers. And, as Grimm remarks, their moral and spiritual significance seems never to have been noted. To-day, it is quite impossible to judge of them from the sixteenth century standpoint. Here and there the gold threads gleam out, in a few detached spots the softness of the flesh-tones or the richness of drapery and landscape still faintly hint of what the whole must have been nearly four hundred years ago. But mostly, time has dealt as heavily with these treasures of the weavers' loom as with the paintings of Leonardo. No longer glowingly rich, exquisite in gradations of tone and colour, they are almost monochromatic in their weak, dull grays. Only the grouping, harmony of arrangement, balance, and general effects of drawing and composition remain. In such ways alone they must be considered, and so considered their inferiority to the cartoons is far more apparent than it could have been in their days of gorgeous brilliancy.

As stated, the ten pieces are known under the title of the Acts of the Apostles. More strictly, they could be called scenes from the lives of Peter and Paul. The first of the series is the Miraculous Draught of Fishes, or, according to Grimm, the First Call to Peter. Two very small boats, hardly large enough to hold one, let alone the three passengers that are in each, are near the shore. In the first, at the bow, Christ is shown sitting in profile, with his right hand raised as if acknowledging from where comes his power. In the middle kneels Peter, his hands clasped, adoring the Master. Andrew, stepping down from the stern, seems about to follow Peter's example. All around are the fish, of which indeed the boat is full. In the other craft are two young men, both tugging with might and main to bring in the heavy haul that drags the net deep into the sea. They are half naked, and the pull on their arms is shown in their rigid muscles thrown out like cords. The old man steering is modelled on the lines of an ancient river god. So far as one can see stretch the waters of Gennesareth unbroken to the horizon line. At the left, people are busy on the shore near the city walls, behind which lofty buildings tower. In the foreground, among the grasses, are cranes eagerly waiting for their share of the catch.

Raphael, of course, was quite incapable of drawing such inadequate boats from the lack of knowledge that they were inadequate. Rather, he used them as the Greeks used symbols, — as mere suggestions. Doubtless when the hanging came fresh from the looms, the colour prevented their diminutiveness from appearing so strongly. Now, when the shades are so faded, when the lights and shadows no longer have their balance of proportion, to modern eyes the insufficiency of these tiny boats sometimes threatens to obliterate the real dignity and nobility of Christ, the fine feeling in the expressions and pose of the disciples.

The borders of the tapestry are very lovely, as indeed are all of the series. At the top of this are the arms of the Medici, at the bottom Leo appears riding with his suite of cardinals at the gates of Rome. On the left is the figure of a woman standing behind an allegorical impersonation of the Arno. On the right, a captain, in classic military dress, welcomes the pontiff. Rome is indicated by the Tiber lying at his feet, his left elbow on a wolf, and a cornucopia in his hand. The side borders are arabesques, impersonations of the seasons, festoons, grotesques, birds, and animals all woven into one harmonious decorative design.

In the Charge to Peter, Christ stands at the left, pointing to a flock of sheep behind him, while with the other hand he emphasises his words to the kneeling Peter, who holds the big key in his arms. Peter is in front of the other disciples, thus connecting and at the same time separating Jesus from the group that is admirable in an arrangement which brings each member clearly into view. The varying attitudes and expressions are given with portrait-like fidelity, the two foremost ones of the number, Andrew and John, being strikingly beautiful. The intent seriousness of Peter is no less plainly shown. In the Redeemer's own figure is an added spiritual dignity and an ideal beauty of face.

So far as is known, no cartoon exists of the third of the series, — the Stoning of St. Stephen. Stephen kneels a little to the left of the centre in deacon's dress, his arms outstretched. He is calling upon God, who, with Christ and Angels, appears before his vision in the skies. Saul sits in the right hand corner of the picture, and directs five or six big, burly ruffians. They are bending, picking up stones or already flinging them at the martyr. The action and grouping of these revilers are extraordinarily spirited, showing, too, some wonderful foreshortening in their positions. This last is especially marked in the man with bared shoulders stooping over in the foreground. The landscape, the really lovely part of the picture, reminds one of the palace-crowned hills about Rome.

The Flemish weavers must have found in the Healing of the Lame Man a subject more congenial and natural for their looms. Here there is no lack of gorgeous ornament, fine dresses, florid architecture. It is a scene much more suitable for reproduction in tapestry than any of the others. Between the twisted pillars, said to have been copied from those brought from Jerusalem to Rome, stand St. Peter and St. John, intent upon their deeds of mercy. Peter is holding the right hand of a fearfully deformed beggar, while with his other he exorcises the evil spirit. The strain in Peter's own hand is evident, and in the uplifted face of the beggar shines his consciousness of the beginning of the cure. On the other side, looking down with compassion, is John, and beyond, between two pillars, another crippled beggar leans on his staff, gazing with neck far forward, skepticism and hope struggling in his ugly face. At the extreme sides of the picture, charming young Roman mothers with their babies are passing along, while a sturdy sprite of a naked boy at one end gives vivacity to the whole.

The Death of Ananias, next in the series, is built somewhat upon the lines of the School of Athens. The apostles are upon a platform, Ananias and his companion on the tessellated pavement below. At the left, beyond, a flight of stairs is seen, on the right, an open window gives a glimpse of a peaceful country landscape. The rough wooden platform with draped background suggests the hasty improvised church of the early Christians. St. Peter, the centre of the apostles, stands with hand extended, his face expressing sternest judgment as he calls down upon the offending perjurer the punishment of Heaven. As if at the command of that pointing finger, Ananias has fallen to the ground in a writhing agony that is already turning to the paralysis of death. The frightened spectators press forward, hardly believing the sight of their eyes. On the platform next to Peter is another apostle, pointing upward, and others at right and left show by their faces their grief and anger at the unhappy man's sin. All the attitudes are vivid to an extreme degree.

The Martyrdom of St. Stephen and the Conversion of St. Paul are not equal to the others, and it is reasonably sure that Raphael's pupils had a large share in their production. The telescopic lines of the composition of the latter are particularly un-Raphaellesque.

Seventh in order is the Punishment of Elymas.

This so absolutely explains in line the Biblical words it illustrates, that, as Müntz observes, nothing describes it better than the verse itself: "And . . . they found a certain sorcerer, a false prophet, a Jew, whose name was Bar-Jesus; which was with the deputy of the country, Sergius Paulus, a prudent man; who called for Barnabas and Saul, and desired to hear the word of God. But Elymas the sorcerer (for so is his name by interpretation) withstood them, seeking to turn away the deputy from the faith. Then Saul (who is also called Paul), filled with the Holy Ghost, set his eyes on him, and said, O full of all subtilty and all mischief, thou child of the devil, thou enemy of all righteousness, wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord? And now, behold, the hand of the Lord is upon thee, and thou shalt be blind, not seeing the sun for a season. And immediately there fell on him a mist and a darkness; and he went about seeking some one to lead him by the hand. Then the deputy, when he saw what was done, believed, being astounded at the doctrine of the Lord." Grimm says that generally one feels, in comparing Raphael's sketches with the finished compositions, a lack in the latter of the splendid breadth and robustness so strongly shown in the original studies. Here, however, he finds this same vigour of treatment. He says that it seems as if he had "brought his models straight on to the cartoon." Indeed, he goes on to note, "A look of common reality lies over the whole which reminds us of photographs. The hand gestures are speaking . . .; most of all Elymas, who is trying to interrupt Paul's discourse, and terrified by the darkness creeping over him, stretches out his arms like huge feelers, which grope tremblingly about in the empty air." As remarkable as any part of the composition is the management of the crowd of spectators, where are infinite variety and movement with no lessening of homogeneity.

Illustrating the verses in the fourteenth chapter of Acts, where Paul heals the cripple, is the tapestry called Paul and Barnabas at Lystra. The moment described is when the people have become convinced that the two are the very gods come to earth, in consequence of which belief they bring oxen and garlands to make sacrifice to them. "Which when the apostles, Barnabas and Paul, heard of, they rent their clothes, and ran in among the people, crying out, and saying, Sirs, why do ye these things?" Here again the full scene is depicted. And no one, it is to be believed, but of Raphael's own genius could have brought all these many incidents and elements into a successfully fused whole. He has succeeded beyond even his own standard. In no other one of all his marvellous compositions has he attained more perfect expression, more abundant life and power, or more absolute coherency. In the forum a crowd is gathered. On one side are the mere spectators, gazing with utmost, astonished devotion at the two apostles who are descending the temple steps. Their own faces show horror and pity, and Paul tears his robe as he turns away from the scene in front, where, led by the sacrificial priests, are the oxen and rams. An executioner lifts his club high over the head of the big ox held by the kneeling captors. By the altar are two entrancing little boys, one blowing the pipes, another bearing the censer. At the moment, a young man, apparently seeing and interpreting the expression in the apostles' faces, springs forward to arrest the intended sacrifice. Among the crowd, the paralytic, the cause of all this excitement, has flung away his crutches and is throwing himself bodily toward his healer, his face full of an incredible joy that is very nearly glee. An old man near him lifts his short garment and examines with astonishment the suddenly straightened legs. Here is another composition by Raphael where vigour and grace, strength and charm, compact lines and masses, along with tremendous variety of form, expression, and position, all mingle and make that wonderful harmony which was the perfection of his art.

In the Preaching at Athens, simple as is the idea, Raphael has, with much less action, given as dramatic and lifelike a scene as in the "Lystra."

Paul is telling the Corinthians that their altar to the Unknown God is the only altar at which they should worship. "And when they heard of the resurrection of the dead, some mocked: and others said, We will hear again of this matter. So Paul departed from among them. Howbeit certain men clave unto him, and believed; among the which was Dionysius the Areopagite, and a woman named Damaris, and others with them." As Paul stands on the steps preaching, he is a simply lined, noble figure. The crowd before him express well the surprise, the skepticism, the doubt, the contemplation of its different members. Every face tells its own story, and every figure helps to balance the consummate scheme of the picture. To give the scene its full significance, Raphael shows Damaris and Dionysius in rapt absorption at the end of the steps.

Paul in Prison, also called The Earthquake, is of much the same order as the St. Stephen and Conversion of St. Paul. Owing to the large part entrusted to his pupils, it is a comparative failure. The tapestry is injured. Paul is behind a grating similar to that of the "Deliverance" in the chamber of Heliodorus. At the corner of the foreground are two men, the foremost of whom is being forced upward by the convulsive movements of the personified Earthquake, — a huge giant who is lifting the earth till he has formed about him a sort of vast cavern.

PREACHING AT ATHENS

The borders of all these tapestries are sumptuous beyond telling in imagery, in dramatic interest, in decorative effect. Many of them, so fine are the groupings and so vivid the scenes they depict, have been assigned to Raphael's own hand. He was one of the first artists to discard the inevitable fruit and flower borders for a sort of running story. Some of these framings are in imitation relief, in monochrome; some, painted in brightest tones, are allegories of the seasons, of the virtues, of life in all sorts of phases, interspersed with geometrical, floral, and grotesque designs where, as in the loggie, birds and reptiles, animals and flowers, are mixed in an exuberance that is never beyond the limits of the decorative. To-day, when the colours of the weavings are so changed, it sometimes seems as if these framing designs were the most beautiful parts of all.

Of the rest of the tapestries in the gallery, nothing much in the way of praise can be given. The wonderful success of the Sistine series decided Leo X. to ask Raphael for another set, descriptive of the Life and Death of Christ. The subjects were The Nativity, Adoration of the Magi, Massacre of the Innocents (in three pieces), Descent into Hell, Resurrection, "Noli Me Tangere," The Supper at Emmaus, the Ascension, the Descent of the Holy Ghost. All except the Descent into Hell still exist in the Vatican. With them is a hanging which was once behind the pontifical throne in the Sistine. So far below the first set are these, so forced the action of the figures, so coarse and common the drawing, so vulgar and heavy the accessories, it is only by diligent study that here and there a bit is found suggesting the master who is said to have designed them. They were undertaken in the last years of his life, and it is doubtful if he made a full study for any one. After his death, his assistants gathered the scattered, separate heads and figures, and built from them the result which is so far below the worst their first projector could have imagined. It was bad enough when pupils less favoured than Giulio Romano undertook so to interpret the master. It was much worse, as Müntz points out, when men "like Tomaso Vincidor da Bologna, or some Fleming who was perfectly strange to the principles of the Renaissance, attempted to continue the work of Raphael."

CHAPTER VIII.

THE SCULPTURE GALLERIES

THE old summer-house of Innocent VIII. is now the centre of the sculpture gallery of the Vatican. During the pontificate of Julius II. and Leo X., their small collection of antique marbles, as has been said, was arranged by Bramante in the gardens of the Belvedere. Under Clement XIV. and Pius VI. they grew to such numbers that some other and better protected housing had to be devised for them. The Pio-Clementine Museum was the result, that followed by the Chiaramonti and the Braccio Nuovo, and then, with Gregory XVI. came the Etruscan and Egyptian rooms. For many years the sculptures of the Vatican were universally regarded as being the most wonderful and perfect specimens of Greek art extant. The later explorations of Greece and the searching investigations of modern critics have torn them from their towering pedestal of fame. Most of the very best specimens have been proved to be merely admirable copies of celebrated works, and the majority of the rest are not even considered first-rate replicas. Such has been the rebound in opinion as to their value. But after all, these copies of antique works of art are in a way more valuable than the undoubted originals that occasionally reward the explorers' excavations. Furtwängler has truly said that even the most mediocre of the marbles in our museums are proof in themselves of the value and celebrity of the originals. The more beautiful and famed a work the more numerous would be its duplicates. There is little question that the greatest marbles of Greek art are lost for ever. It is only by the replicas, bad copies as they may be, that one can learn the charm and value of the rarest of the antique sculptures. And nowhere are copies more abundant, or, on the whole, more excellent than in the enormous collection of the Museum of the Vatican.

Whatever the critical estimate of the actual value of the collection itself, there can be no two opinions as to its extent or arrangement. Nowhere are galleries more splendidly designed for their purpose or more artistically decorated, or antiquities more intelligently and beautifully arranged, than in the palace of the Popes. Of the sixteen rooms stretching from each end of the Braccio Nuovo, bounding all sides of the Giardino della Pigna, and squaring the Cortile di Belvedere, each is paved, walled, arched, and lighted with unusual taste, and with a continuity of design and purpose not often seen in public museums. The prevailing colour of the walls is an old rose, a most effective setting for the creams and grays of the statues.

The Museo Pio-Clementino is made up of eleven different compartments. Of these the most beautiful in construction and ornamentation are the Sala a Croce Greca, built by Simonetti under Pius VI., and, as its name suggests, in the shape of a Greek cross, with its floor paved with fine mosaics, some of them found in the Villa Ruffinella, near Frascati; the Sala della Biga, a circular hall with a cupola; the Galleria dei Candelabri, a very long corridor with ceiling paintings and a handsome modern marble pavement; here are some lovely vases in marbles of unusual and striking colours; the Sala Rotunda, also erected by Simonetti, and with a fine mosaic flooring found in the Thermæ at Otricoli; Sala delle Muse, a magnificent room, of octagon form, domed, and ornamented with sixteen columns of Carrara marble; Galleria delle Statue, the summer-house proper of Innocent VIII., still with traces in the lunettes of paintings by Pinturicchio; Gabinetto delle Maschere, so called from the ancient mosaic in the centre of the floor, which was found in Hadrian's villa; the Cortile del Belvedere, part of the original summer-house, has an inner arcade and corner cabinets where are some of the chief gems of the collection; finally, the Museo Chiaramonti, chiefly remarkable for its great length. In this corridor alone there are fully three hundred marbles. Of all the Vatican's many hundreds of statues, it will, of course, be possible to speak of only a few.

Dilettanti, amateurs, connoisseurs, archeologists, have exhausted themselves and their language in description, appreciation, adulation, and criticism of the Apollo Belvedere. For long it was supposed to be an original dating from the fourth century B. C., an example, therefore, of the greatest era in Grecian art. Now it is pretty conclusively proved to be no original at all, and most probably a copy of a work of the Hellenistic period. This statue, according to Helbig, was not found at Antium, as has been generally claimed, but in an estate belonging to Cardinal Giuliano della Rovere near Grotta Ferrata. It is said that Giuliano bought it the very day it was discovered. The top of the quiver, the left hand, the right arm almost from the shoulder, and various small parts of drapery and legs were all restored by Montorsoli. It is stated also that he has not put the right arm quite as far forward as it should be, and the open hand he has given it is universally condemned.

Poised so lightly that he seems to be moving through the air rather than on solid earth, the god is shown with his weight somewhat thrown upon his left foot, his right slightly behind and with the toes only touching the ground, as if he were advancing rapidly but noiselessly. The twist of the figure is marvellous, slight, yet full of a rhythmic harmony. From the waist he turns toward the right, while his head is thrown sharply to the other side. The left arm is held far out and is partly draped by the chlamys which hangs from the neck and over the back and left shoulder, mostly covering the quiver slung over his back. His right arm is also away from the body, and the restorer has placed upon it a foolishly open forceless hand. There have been reams written discussing the nature of the object he is supposed to have carried in his left hand. Furtwängler says positively that the one time prevalent notion that it was an ægis is wholly incorrect. He, as well as several modern archæologists, claim that in that hand he held a bow, and in the right a bunch of laurel with knotted woollen bands, the traces of which are found in the bit of laurel carved on the tree-stump at his side. He was thus shown in his double capacity of the "far-darter" and the healer. Whatever he was originally meant to represent, there is a subtilty of swing and expression that makes the statue something far removed from a mere type. It is a vivid presentation of an intense personality, at a suddenly intense moment. One feels in the superb poise a very rush of noiseless movement as if he had sped away from concealing clouds. His face is no less expressive. The slight scornful lift of the proud lips, the brows just hinting at a contraction, and the quivering nostrils all seem to suggest some definite, hasty demand upon the god, rousing his wrath and calling for his assistance. The calm forehead, however, is unruffled. It is as if the scorn and indignation of the rest of the face were held in check by his consciousness of his infinite mind. And yet, in spite of the boldness, the surety, the sweep of the poise, the nobility of brow, and the godlike charm of the whole creation, there are other things besides that prevent unalloyed or deepest admiration. The overelaborate hair, the careful, precise, though beautiful, folds of the chlamys, ill according with the swift onrush of the wearer, the almost too exquisite curve of outline, a sort of dainty grace and an indubitable if slight theatricalness about the whole figure, all are foreign to the grand simplicity and noble directness of the greatest art creations. It has been called the "prince of a fairy tale," a not inapt title. Yet, granting all its severest detractors have alleged against it, the Apollo remains what its first lovers called it, — a thing of joy for ever. His "noble limbs are moulded with the ease and freedom which are the result of perfect mastery, and the proud and beautiful face from which the Muses drew their inspiration gleams with expression as he moves along in graceful majesty, bathed in the purple light of eternal youth."

APOLLO BELVEDERE
In the Cortile del Belvedere

In its own "Gabinetto" in the Cortile is the Laocoön, the group famous not only in art but literature. The subject of a wonderful essay on the limitations of different arts by Lessing, it has been discussed in all its relations by Winckelmann, Goethe, Heine, and others, and is still under constant examination among archæologists. It was discovered in January, 1506, near the Thermæ of Titus, and when Michelangelo and San Gallo were sent to inspect the wonderful find they declared it was the group described by Pliny as having stood in the palace of Titus. Lübke is of the opinion that there is no reason for the supposition fostered by Pliny's remarks that it was originally made for the palace. At least it is proved by actual measurement that the niche in which it was said to have stood is too small to hold it. The right arm of Laocoön is a restoration of the early eighteenth century, and indeed the right arms of both of the sons are modern, and incorrectly placed at that. Laocoön was a priest of Apollo, and because he blasphemed against the god two snakes were sent to destroy him and his two boys, as he was about to offer sacrifice at the altar to Neptune. The altar is behind the priest in the group, and the two boys are on each side.

Making a connected group of the three otherwise detached figures, are the huge pythons. They have wound their folds about them in a terrible struggle in which one son is already expiring, while the father is in the midst of the most awful death-dealing agonies. The other son as yet is unbitten. The folds, however, are about him, but as he turns to gaze horror-struck at his father, the spectator feels that he at least may have a chance of escape. It is the only point of perspective, so to speak, the only outlet, in the whole composition. The uncertainty as to his fate is just enough to give one a breathing space from the accumulated horror of certainty as to the end of all the rest. It adds greatly, therefore, to the dramatic intensity of the group. The shape of the composition is pyramidal. Though the father has half-sunken to the altar in his agony, he is still above the two sons, both of whom are under size. This pyramidal form is increased by his wrongly restored right arm, now thrust through the serpent coils up into the air far above his head. It would be more compact and better massed if the hand was where it undoubtedly originally was, resting on or near the head.

To Lessing, the horrible convulsions of the three victims meant a tremendously heroic struggle with destiny. It was the mental significance that lay behind the tortured limbs and anguished face of the father that made it seem to him so wondrous a work. If one could thus translate the struggle to the realms of real tragedy unquestionably the grandeur of the group would be immeasurably increased. But to most observers to-day there is little to be seen or felt but mere physical agony. This is carried to its extreme in a marvellously effective manner. Of all the creations of plastic art no face, it is safe to say, has ever succeeded in producing such an intensity of suffering as that of the Laocoön. Homer can go no further. Whether the representation of such a state is a proper subject for the plastic arts is another question. During the eighteenth and early part of the nineteenth century the Laocoön was the subject of the wildest sort of praise. Modern criticism has to a certain extent robbed it of the supremacy then undisputed. Besides the question as to its actual intrinsic artistic value, there has been and even still is no less amount of conjecture as to the date of its execution. It seems to be generally conceded that it is an original, the only point of doubt being whether it was a work of Rhodes of a later date than the Pergamum frieze, or whether the opinions of earlier archæologists, who assign it to a period at least no later than the early part of the second century B.C., can be sustained. Furtwängler and others of equal prominence place it later. It is claimed that its similarity, and at the same time its inferiority, to parts of this same Pergamum frieze prove that its construction came at a later and less artistic date.

In the Cortile del Belvedere

The Torso, the world-famous Torso of the Belvedere, has been subjected to equally scathing criticism. Even the old story of its discovery and placing in the Belvedere by Julius II. has been questioned, till now it is generally conceded that it was in the Colonna family down to the time of Clement VII., and by him was put among the Vatican collections. There is one indignity the Torso has escaped. It has never been defamed by the restorer's hand. In all its maimed glory, just as it was dug from the crumbling ruins, it rests to-day on its revolving pedestal in the Museo Pio-Clementino. It is indeed merely a torso, — no head, no neck, no arms, part of the left shoulder gone, the right leg broken off at the knee and the left but slightly below it, — no wonder the vandal restorer felt the task beyond even his powers. We may congratulate ourselves that there was so little undestroyed. Given a leg and arm or two more, and some one would have tried to match them. It is supposed to represent Hercules, partly from the lion skin that is spread upon the rock on which the god is sitting. He is bent sidewise to the right, and forward, and then is twisted to the left, giving chance for a fine play of muscles. The artist's name carved is Apollonios, son of Nestor.

The fact that names of sculptors were not usual in the works of early artists is one reason why the first century B. C. is ascribed as the date of this fragment.

It is thought that Apollonios may have been the same sculptor who made the celebrated chryselephantine statue of Jupiter for the new Capitoline temple consecrated in 69 B. C. All sorts of ideas have been advanced as to what the whole statue must have been. One theory is that the god was sitting playing a large cithara supported by the left thigh, while he was singing over the success of his labours. Again it has been ventured that he was only one of a group. Whatever he was, that which is left of him has been the admiration and the despair of artists from the time of Michelangelo to Gérôme. The great Italian said that all the excellencies of antique sculpture were in it alone, and he called himself its humble pupil, claiming that to it he owed all his power for representing the human form. And when he was an old man he used to run his trembling fingers lovingly over its outlines. Compared with the giants of the Pergamum frieze, modern criticism says that it has not their fresh freedom of muscles or their exquisite rendering of skin and veins. Indeed, even Winckelmann, who rhapsodised over the extraordinary strength and beauty of the torso, was impressed with the strange absence of vein indications. To his mind, they were left out to help to make clear the superhuman nature of the god! Antiquaries agreeing or no, Michelangelo's opinion of the rare beauty and power of this broken god, will for most seem the true appreciation. Massive, strong, full of grace, energy, and elasticity, there are few statues that better deserve the admiration of all times. The mere workmanship shows the sculptor to have been past master of his craft. The softened tooling has left no marks, the surface of the skin is of velvet smoothness, and through it all is a sensitive delicacy that makes the more tremendous the weighty strength that lies behind the big muscles.

Perhaps the Mercury, once wrongly called the Antinous of the Belvedere, has of all the noted works of the Vatican suffered the least under the fire of modern research. To be sure, since the discovery of the Olympus Hermes, it is usually regarded as being a copy, rather than an original. But, at least, if it is a copy, then the original, one is sure, must either have been of a transcendent beauty way beyond the god of Praxiteles, or else the copy is, to all intents and purposes, as satisfactory as the undoubted original would be. For it is only when direct comparison is made between this and the one on Olympus that any slightest lack is felt. It was found in 1543, in a garden near the castle of St. Angelo, and Paul III. put it into the Belvedere garden. The legs were broken in two places when it was discovered, and the joining was incorrectly done, so that the ankle appears deformed.

The statue stands in the well-known Praxitelean attitude, the whole weight resting easily upon the right foot, the other leg bent slightly behind it, only the toes resting upon the ground. The right arm, which appears to have been more or less advanced from the shoulder, is gone, and the left wrist and hand are also wanting. One end of the chlamys is thrown over the left chest, and then it drops down the back, to be caught up and over the left forearm. The head is bent forward and slightly to one side, with the quiet, distantly pensive expression also clearly associated with Praxiteles. It has been generally considered that this must be a copy of a statue by that sculptor, though certain critics have ascribed it to a slightly later period. The original was probably of bronze. The large free modelling, the beautiful planes of the chest and shoulders, the soft, yet never weak, masses of muscle, the grace and ease of the position, the proportion of the parts to each other, the overhuman individuality of the whole, mark this as one of the chief treasures of the Vatican. Possibly the head is a trifle small, and the expression of not quite the majestic sweetness and concentration of divine power felt in the Olympian statue; but it is a rarely lovely, thoughtful, charming head none the less. Perhaps the two most wonderful things about it are the subtle, beautiful swing of its poise and the intense feeling of flesh in its marble planes. Almost one can see the pulsing veins beneath, almost one is sure it would yield to the pressure of the finger-tips. Only, one thinks, has Michelangelo in his David succeeded in achieving such a semblance of living flesh. The gradations in its modelling are as subtle as Titian produced with his brush. To quote a well-known author, "It is an exquisite image of blooming youth. For soft and delicate beauty, — beauty which, like that of the vernal rose, the sunset cloud, and the breaking wave, is suggestive of brief continuance and early decay, — this statue has no superior, hardly an equal. . . . The softness of the limbs just stops short of languid effeminacy. It is beauty, not like that of the Apollo, in action, but in repose, filled to the brim with sweet sensations; neither restless from desire nor cloyed with enjoyment."

Very similar in pose is the Meleager of the Belvedere. In spite of this resemblance in attitude, the difference in conception of character and impression of the whole figure is remarkable. Standing like the Mercury, with all his weight on the right leg, the other slightly bent and resting somewhat behind the left foot, just as in the Hermes, the line from the hips down only differs in the somewhat more extreme angle of the latter. The right hip of Meleager is not thrown out quite so strongly. The chlamys, which is probably a Roman addition, is buttoned on his right shoulder and slightly covers his chest before it slips down the back, and then, as in the other, is wound once over the left arm. But here is one of the noticeable points of difference. There are no lazy, quiet folds here, expressing in every line the pensive attitude of the Mercury. The ends of the chlamys are flowing straight out, as if a breeze had caught and held them. And undoubtedly it was a breeze. But it was made by the hero himself. One can fairly see the whirl he must have given the drapery as he flung it impatiently about him and rushed along. In his right arm, which is bent as Praxiteles often bent it, and resting on his right hip behind him, there is, however, the feeling of energy and action, very unlike the nonchalant ease of Praxiteles. The head, instead of being bent thoughtfully downward, is turned sharply to the left, his eyes are gazing piercingly in the same direction. The beautiful half-open lips with their scornful curves, the slightly inflated nostrils, all give a life, an outward expression at variance with the type as we know it, of Praxiteles. The modelling of the forms is somewhat different also. There is less of softness and grace, a hint of stronger lines and more decided angles and planes. Altogether it seems probable, according to modern criticism, to assign the original of this to Scopas. It was found, on the authority of Aldroandi, near the Porta Portese on the Janiculus. Beside the statue, on his right, is a badly sculptured dog looking up to him, and on his left is a boar's head. This last indication, evidently, of the fight in which Meleager came off victor — to his own future harm. It is supposed that the boar's head is of Græco-Roman manufacture. The elaboration of it, when it is such a mere accessory, is very unlike Grecian art. The statue is in perfect condition, except for its left hand, and it is said that Michelangelo did not dare restore that.

The Apoxyomenos in the Braccio Nuovo was found in April, 1849, in the ruins of a private house in the Vicolo delle Palme in Trastevere. The restorations are all of a minor order. Tenerani added the fingers of the right hand, the die, the tip of the left thumb, parts of the strigil, and all the toes.

After exercising at the Palæstra, the Greeks used a metal scraper (the strigil) to remove the sand which had accumulated on their oil-rubbed bodies. This statue shows a youth in the act of cleaning the lower side of his right arm, which is held out for the purpose. Lysippus, who is supposed to be the sculptor of the bronze original, was a contemporary of Scopas and Praxiteles, and was as famous in the Peloponnesus as were they in Attica. Certain characteristics for which this master was noted among the ancients are strongly marked in this figure. Very tall and slender, the proportions of the whole figure, with the much smaller head, longer legs, slighter wrists and ankles, all show the innovations introduced by Lysippus. They were marked innovations, even when compared with the Parthenon figures or the Doryphoros of Polycleitus. The mobility of this Apoxyomenos is such that every change of each movement of his arm is almost visible. His weight is still partly on his right leg, and its momentary, sidewise stretch is wonderfully indicated. The expression of the face is much more individual and has more intellectuality than the statues of an earlier date. The play of the muscles is faithfully shown and the skin is admirably indicated as being a covering for the flesh beneath. It is an idealistic treatment of a realistic subject and is peculiarly that of the type attributed to Lysippus. Like him, too, is the care bestowed on details, such as the rendering of the hair in separate locks. The face is naturalistic to a degree that it almost becomes portraiture. Again what one would expect from the chisel of the man who was always chosen by Alexander the Great for his numerous portrait busts and statues.

There are in the Sala della Biga two statues of Discobolus, the disk thrower. One represents the athlete in repose, the other at the moment of action. The one in repose has been variously ascribed to Naucydes, a pupil of Polycleitus, to Alcamenes, a contemporary of Phidias and Myron. Brunn gives it to the latter, backing up his belief by showing the points of similarity between this and better known types of Myron.

The statue was found by Gavin Hamilton in 1792 in the ruins of an ancient villa on the Via Appia, and it was acquired for the Vatican by Pius VI. It is only slightly restored in minor parts. The athlete is shown at the moment when he has just grasped the discus in his left hand, which still hangs easily at his side. With his right hand bent at the elbow and forefingers held out, as if he were measuring the space to cover, he seems to be studying the direction and distance that he must throw. The figure is firmly but elastically poised, and there is a well executed intentness and preparation for movement in the whole body. The face, too, though not carried to the extreme expressiveness of a late day, clearly indicates the keen interest and speculation of the moment.

Myron, who is universally acknowledged to be the author of the bronze original from which the other Discobolus must have been copied, was celebrated in antiquity, both for his statues of athletes and for his representations of animals. His was the bronze cow about which so many epigrams were written. Goethe summarised these bon mots, — a few of which were, that, so real was she, “a lion sprang upon her to tear her to pieces; the shepherd threw his halter about her neck to lead her to pasture; some pelted her with stones; others whistled to her; the farmer brought his plough to yoke her in for work; the gadfly settled on her hide; and even Myron himself was at a loss to distinguish her from the rest of his herd.” It was this same ability to portray life, life, too, at an intense moment, that made his athletes so famous. Lucian in speaking of one of these noted figures so exactly describes several existing statues, that there is no doubt they were copies after the bronze original. In the Vatican is one of them, though it is not so good an example as one owned by Prince Lancelotti of Rome. With his whole weight upon his right foot, which rests squarely upon the ground, the athlete has grasped the discus with all the strength of his right arm, and flung it up and back as far as it will go. His whole shoulder and torso follow the violent movement of the arm. This gives a twist to the body that brings into play admirably worked muscles, and makes a movement that at once suggests the inevitable return in the opposite direction. His head is here improperly placed. It should follow the motion of the right arm. The face itself is still somewhat of the archaic type, where the most violent movements of the body left unaltered its perpetual smile of sweet intelligence. That, too, is typical of Myron, for even the critics of his own day objected to his expressionless faces. But this seizing of a passing moment at the very height of one action, just before it merges into the next, and so spiritedly that at once one's mind and eye leap to that next — in this lies Myron's great genius. As Lübke says, there is "in it the most acute observation of life, the most just conception of bold, rapid movement, and the greatest freedom in the expression of the action." It was found by Count Fede in 1791 in Hadrian's Tiburtine Villa, and Pius VI. bought it.

Of almost modern feeling and treatment is the lovely crouching Venus in the Gabinetto delle Maschere. It was discovered about 1760 in the Tenuta Salone, situated on the Via Prænestina, and got by Pius VI. from the painter La Piccola. The entire back of the head, the upper part of the left ear, and all the hair except that lying upon the neck, are restored. The fingers are modern, as well, probably, as the whole of the right hand and wrist. Modern, too, are the front of the right foot, two toes on the left, most of the vase, with its waves, and various fragments of the body. The face also has been slightly retouched by the restorer.

As the name indicates, the goddess is represented in a crouching position, as if she were just under the spray of a shower bath. The attitude is extremely charming in the way the limbs cross and partly conceal each other, and the modelling of the whole body is delicate and sensitive to a degree. According to Pliny, the temple of Jupiter, within the Portico of Octavia in Rome, had a marble statue by Dædalos, of Venus seated in the bath. It is reasoned that this and similar statues are reproductions of this ancient one. Dædalos is supposed to have been a Bithynian of the period of the Diadochi. This is especially regarded as true, as it is not likely such a statue was designed before the Cnidian Aphrodite. The "accentuation of the sensuous element and the realistic treatment of the nude" presuppose a period after rather than before Alexander the Great.

CROUCHING VENUS
In the Gabinetto delle Maschere

In the Sala a Croce Greca is the Vatican copy of the most famous Venus ever sculptured. With the exception of the Zeus of Phidias, no statue in the ancient world received such unbounded praise as did the Aphrodite of Cnidus. As Pliny tells the story, Praxiteles made two Venuses, — one clothed, the other nude. He offered them for sale at the same time, and the people of Cos, perhaps for moral and religious reasons, selected the one that was draped. The Cnidians therefore took the other, and to the fame of the statue was due all the future prosperity of that place. In showing how it was valued, Pliny goes on to say that the Cnidian national debt was very large, and Nicomedes, King of Bithynia, offered to pay the whole of it in exchange for the statue. But the Cnidians preferred to remain in debt rather than relinquish this work of art. Up to Praxiteles's time a nude goddess of love had scarcely been thought possible. That he succeeded in presenting her undraped, and yet kept her the goddess to be worshipped, proved how great a triumph he achieved. The statue was of Parian marble and stood in the centre of a small temple in a grove of myrtle and other trees. Here the art of the period as well as the art of Praxiteles reached its culmination. It expressed probably as no other statue the spirit of the new Attic school, — and it could have been created neither in the preceding nor following period of Hellenic art.

The copy in the Vatican is not a first-class work, though it has very many beauties. The head, unfortunately, is turned in the wrong direction. She should be looking more toward the left shoulder, with the head slightly bent backward. Owing to certain moral scruples at that time rampant in Vatican authorities, it was deemed expedient to drape the statue. A metal covering was therefore made, and now hangs from below the hips. As may be easily imagined, it does not add to the beauty of the figure. She stands, as now represented, resting upon the right foot, her left hand holding the superimposed drapery in front, her right arm dropping the real drapery on to a vase at her side. The large, free modelling of the shoulders and arms, the subtileness of the poise of the torso, recall the hand of the great master, but there is a trace of heaviness and sensuousness that can hardly be pure Praxitelean. And the face, though with a calmer and less abashed expression than some of the other copies, has certainly not the entrancing loveliness imputed to it by the ancients. Moreover, unquestionably antique as it is, it could not have belonged originally to the present body, for the two are of different marble and differently executed.

According to the testimony of ancient documents, the Eros of Praxiteles was only less beautiful than his Aphrodite. The story goes that Phryne wished to secure for herself the work most esteemed by the sculptor. She, therefore, had an alarm of fire sounded, and the artist, thinking his studio was in flames, exclaimed: "If my Eros or Satyr is burned, I am undone." So she chose the Cupid, and sent it to the temple in her native town of Thespiai, where it was worshipped till Caligula stole it. Claudius, however, returned it to Thespiai, and there it stayed till Nero took it and put it in the Portico of Octavia in Rome. During the reign of Titus it and the portico were destroyed by fire. Pausanias saw only a copy of it at Thespiai by an Athenian, made to take the place of the great original. No one knows now whether any copy still exists, though the "genius of the Vatican" and its many replicas may hold faint traces of it. At least it is evident that Praxiteles represented him in the early years of youth, pensive and dreamy, and persuasive, rather than as the mischievous child. It was made of Pentelic marble and winged, and in his lowered right hand he held his bow, while from his eyes, as an epigram says, came shooting the arrows of love. The one in the Galleria delle Statue was found in a group of ruins known as Centocelli, on Via Labianca, and acquired for the Vatican by Clement XIV. The point of the nose and fragments of hair are fortunately the only restorations. No attempt has been made to add legs to this torso or even to piece on the arms, which are both broken above the elbow. There are holes in the back, showing where wings, perhaps of gilded bronze, were once added. Poorly executed as this is, in comparison with what is known of the work of Praxiteles, it has a grace and sweetness, a dreamy tenderness of expression, and a soft suppleness of modelling that make it a very lovely fragment.

Another and less doubtful copy of a statue by Praxiteles is the Resting Faun or Satyr in Braccio

Nuovo. It is the exactness of description of this work that has come down to us, rather than its own excellencies, that makes this certain. In itself it is not a particularly good work and shows few touches that distinguish the labours of one who grasps both technically and mentally the whole idea of the work before him. Praxiteles conceived this quiet, restful figure, probably, in his intermediate period. It does not show all the freedom from tradition found in the Hermes of Olympia, but it is at least a new type. The rollicking, sensual nature of the satyr is the phase the sculptors before him always presented. Here he is almost like a young Apollo. There is, to be sure, a delicate smile on the lips that hints of untold mischief behind, and in the languorous eye is something of a voluptuous glance. But as a whole the graceful figure has little resemblance to the accepted faun type. He stands mostly upon his left foot, somewhat assisted by his right arm, which leans at the elbow upon the tree-stump beside him. His right leg is bent, the toes pressed directly behind the heel of the other foot. Over his right shoulder and crossing his back and chest is a tiger skin which his left hand, resting on his hip, pushes to one side. Grace and charm and lazy enjoyment are the chief characteristics of this statue. The original undoubtedly gave him a flute in his right hand, and one could imagine that the dreamy, amused expression of his face came from his trying to catch the last notes of the sweet strain. In the Vatican copy, for no apparent reason, instead of the flute he holds a pedum. The nose, right forearm, and pedum, two fingers on the left hand, various parts of the panther skin, the left foot, a great toe of right foot, and the upper part of the stem are restorations.

There is another satyr in rosso antico (red marble) in the Gabinetto delle Maschere, which is very unlike the one by Praxiteles. It was found by Count Fede in the Tiburtine Villa of Hadrian, and obtained for the Vatican by Pius VI. The glass-paste eyes, probably entire right arm, and various other less important parts are restored. The bestial element is here the most noticeable trait. Standing with his left foot slightly advanced, his head is lifted as he gazes up to the bunch of grapes held high in his right hand. The greedy light in the glass eyes is well represented, and the colour of the marble suggests vividly the sunburned skin of this forest denizen. The whole appearance of the figure, especially perhaps the goat-like appendages on the throat, places it in the Hellenistic period of art. There are other indications, however, that relegate the work to the Græco-Roman days.

Far different from the Apollo Belvedere is the slighter, more youthful figure of the god in the Galleria delle Statue called the Apollo Sauroctonos —

a term given it by Pliny, and meaning the Lizard Slayer. Critics agree in assigning the original to Praxiteles, and Furtwängler places it at a date somewhat earlier than the Hermes of Olympia. It is at least very unlike that majestic work in either form or expression. The slight, delicate build suggests rather the satyr style than that of the athlete. He rests on the right leg and leans slightly forward, with the left leg bent sharply at knee, the toes of foot directly at back of the heel of the other foot. With his outstretched left hand he steadies himself by the tree-stump beside him, while with his right he is about to strike the lizard crawling on the tree. The ancients gave great praise to the statue, extolling first of all the unusual and graceful attitude. And even in this copy the body, so lightly is it poised, could surely swing straight around the tree. The head is of the Venus type, with gently broadening forehead, hair nearly identical with the Cnidos goddess of love. Here, to be sure, there is little of the ideal beauty ascribed to the face, but the attitude, as has been said, must be nearer the original. It is full of a soft, sweeping grace, with the broadly and tenderly modelled forms that are not without traces of the severer simplicity of the Phidian days. The contrast in the muscles of the left side, a little strained by the sharp uplifting of the left arm, and the more compressed ones of the right, gives charm to the pose and a symmetrical balance. It was found in 1777 in the Villa Magnani on the Palatine. A large part of the top of the head, entire left side of face, including eye, nose, mouth, and chin, the right forearm, three fingers of the left hand, the right leg from the middle of the thigh, and the left leg from knee downwards, part of the tree-trunk, with the upper part of the lizard and the plinth, all are restorations.

Among the earliest antique statues found and placed in the Belvedere was the Sleeping Ariadne, now in the Galleria delle Statue. Even in the pontificate of Julius II., she already adorned a fountain in the Vatican garden. For a long time she was called Cleopatra, probably because of a bracelet in the form of a little serpent which is on the upper part of the left arm. The nose and lips are restored, as are also the right hand, the third and fourth fingers of left hand, the rock on which she reclines, the end of her robe which hangs down over the rocks below the left elbow, and the horizontal section of this garment between the rocky projection and the vertical fold hanging from her thigh.

Stretched out upon the boulder, she is supposed to be sunk in the sleep in which Theseus left her, just before, presumably, Dionysius found her. It has been conjectured that the original, for this, too, is unquestionably a copy, was taken from a painting, perhaps the one Pausanias describes as being in the Temple of Dionysius at Athens. The faults in the drapery, with the slight indistinctness of parts, have been laid to the copyist. But perhaps these are the mistakes of the painter rather than the sculptor. The attitude is dignified and the forms noble. The position of the head, bent upon its left arm, may slightly recall the Medicean statue of Michelangelo. There is, with the other arm also thrown over the head, a certain complexity not usual in the best art periods of Greece. It is more like the floridity of Roman art. The two sides of the face, also, as Winckelmann pointed out, are not even, and one feels pretty sure that the restorer did not accomplish all he might with the mouth. The tumbled drapery has suggested to many that it is indicative of the unhappy, uneasy dreams of the deserted Ariadne.

Very much more beautiful is the drapery of a headless, neckless, and armless girl in the Museo Chiaramonti. Indeed, this so-called Daughter of Niobe is one of the most beautiful draped statues in Rome or anywhere else. It was found near Tivoli, and was formerly in the garden of the Quirinal. It is unspoiled by the restorer, and so perfect is it in all it suggests, that the missing forms are scarcely needed. Nothing, one feels, could add to the charm of the motion, or to the expressiveness of the figure as it flies over the ground. She is, according to Furtwängler, not so much a copy as she is an Hellenistic adaptation of an earlier statue from the famous group. Every fold of the exquisite drapery expresses the fleeing rush of the frightened girl. The chiton, that covers the figure without hiding the shape beneath, clings closely over the legs, emphasizing with every line the pressure of the wind against it. The garment above, with its wider, freer, looser folds, tells even more unerringly of the impetuous dash of the wearer.

There are several statues of Amazons in the Vatican, all of them far removed in artistic value from what has been written concerning the ancient originals. The story goes that three artists, Phidias, Polycleitus, and Kresilas, in a certain competition, all made statues of Amazons. In spite of the great fame of Phidias, it was Polycleitus who won, and it was his Amazon that received the greatest admiration of after generations. It is generally supposed that both the Polycleitan and Phidian types are represented in the Vatican, though so badly that any just estimate of the originals is about impossible. The Mattei Amazon in the Galleria delle Statue is the one usually assigned to Phidias. The weight of the body is mostly on the right leg, the left bent, her left arm hanging down, and her right lifted over her head. A short tunic reaches not quite to her knees, leaving her breast uncovered. Purchased by Clement XIV., it has been largely restored. The neck, both arms, top half of quiver, right leg from knee to ankle, upper half of tree-trunk with shield and axe upon it, and crest of helmet are all modern. The head, which is united to the body by a modern throat, is antique, but belongs to another statue. No replica of this type has retained its head. It is softer and slenderer than the Polycleitan type, but ought not, authorities seem to urge, to be placed later than the close of the fifth century B. C.

In the Braccio Nuovo is the one ascribed to Polycleitus. It was found in Frascati, and was formerly in the Camuccini collection. The nose, both arms, quiver, right leg, left leg from knee downwards, support, and plinth are modern. Here she is distinctly represented as being wounded. The right hand is held above the head, and originally the thumb at least must have been touching it, while the left arm was resting on a plinth. There is an expression of suffering upon the face explained by the wound near her right breast, although the face is after the conventional and earlier method. The breadth in the forehead and cheek-bones, with the narrowness in cheek and chin, the projecting eyelids and finely cut lips, denoting its bronze original, all mark it as characteristic of the work of Polycleitus, who still adhered to the strict and impassive style.

One of the best known statues of Leochares, generally considered to have been a pupil of Scopas, was his Rape of Ganymede. There is a late copy of this work in the Galleria dei Candelabri, largely restored, but, with the exception of the left arm, probably correctly. The boy, with his shepherd's crook, pipe, and dog, has evidently been resting on a wooded summit, shown by the shape of the plinth and the tree behind him. Zeus's messenger, the eagle, has swooped down upon him, and with wings outspread is carrying him up to the height where dwells the king of the gods. The hound, left below, howls after him with upraised head. In Roman times this subject was used for monuments of children who died young, and most likely this was such a funeral stone. Of course one cannot see here the real worth of Leochares's work. But much of the idea and scheme of composition is plain, and the artist has succeeded in freeing the marble from its heaviness and ponderosity without violating the laws of his material. The flight upward is very cleverly indicated, and the original had a bold inventiveness that places Leochares high in the artistic ranks. Even in this marble the justness of Pliny's observation can be seen, that the eagle's claws, fastened just above the youth's waist and through the slight drapery, were holding the delicate flesh as reluctantly as if the bird himself feared to give pain.

The Zeus Otricoli, the massive bust in the Rotunda, is regarded by many as a fair copy at least of the most famous of all the antique statues, the Jupiter of Phidias that stood at Olympia till 500 A. D. But archæologists are now inclined to think this impossible. The very things that give this bust its grandeur and lifelike attributes are what really make it evident that it is not a copy of the ancient masterpiece. That gold and ivory god must have been a much quieter, less complicated conception, — one portraying more unbrokenly the calm majesty of the father of the gods. Here we feel the play of many different emotions. If it expresses most strongly a benignant thoughtfulness, it shows equally clearly the tremendous energy, the impressive power and wonderful sense of something mysterious and undefined. The deep shadows of the eyes; the mighty brows; the slightly open mouth with its sensuous curves partly concealed by the heavily cut moustache; the eyebrows, one much more curved than the other; the slightly expanded nostrils, — all combine to suggest a remarkable play of thought and emotion. The sculptor has amazingly indicated that all the powers and passions and thoughts of the universe could here find expression. All this play of intellectual life is characteristic of the second

Attic school rather than that of Phidias, when emotion was much more restrained in its manifestation. It may possibly be taken from a Zeus by Bryaxis or Leochares. The restorations include the whole back and top of head, the left side of forehead, tip of nose, ends of hair, and bust.

The statue of Apollo in the Gabinetto delle Maschere has also been called Adonis. It was found in Via Labiacana at Centocelle, and acquired under Pius VI. He is placed beside a tree-stump, his right leg decidedly advanced, left arm lightly lifted from his side and extended, the right dropping down holding the restorer's javelin. His head is bent and turned to the left. The nose, left side, and back of head, left arm up to shoulder, right arm below biceps, right leg, left foot, stem, and plinth are all modern. It is probably a copy of a work by a master of the fourth century, B. C., who adhered more or less strictly to the older traditions of the Argive school. The soft dreaminess of the face, and the whole gentle, placid attitude suggest the Praxiteles Eros.

Still another Apollo is in Sala delle Muse, and goes by the name of the Apollo Citharoedos. The heavily draped figure has little of the masculine about it. It might be one of the Muses rather than Apollo the god. The left leg is in advance of the right, and both feet are elaborately sandalled. The drapery consists of a girdled robe coming fully down to the elbows and ankles, and a heavy cloak falling in voluminous folds from the shoulder. The garianded head is tipped slightly backward, listening to the music of the cithara, which he holds in his left hand and strikes with his right. The grace and swing of the figure are charming, and would be more so except for the superfluous, overdone drapery. It has been claimed to be a copy of a work by Scopas. If so the draperies were a late Roman addition.

Athena Giustiniani, sometimes called Minerva Medica, was found near the Church of S. Maria Sopra Minerva, and was purchased by Pius VII. The statue represents Athena, fully robed, a helmet on her head, standing in a placid, reposeful attitude, her weight largely but not wholly thrown upon the left leg. She holds a spear in her left hand, while her right toys with the edge of her robe at her waist. By her right side is coiled a serpent whose head is lifted toward her. The face of the goddess is extremely quiet, contemplative, the mouth slightly drooping, expressing either dissatisfaction or melancholy. It is the intellectual side of the goddess that is represented. Furtwängler considers it a good copy of a statue by Euphranor of Corinth, who lived about 375 - 330 B. C. But other critics have judged it to be of an earlier date. It certainly suggests some of the earlier, severer types, but the sophisticated treatment of the drapery, the freedom of the masses of hair and various details of the dress and helmet seem to indicate that Furtwängler may be right in his conjecture. At all events it is a charming if slightly mannered statue, with exquisite feeling about the face and neck, and with a dignified, godlike pose that vividly portrays the character of the goddess. It is in the Braccio Nuovo.

The so-called Venus Anadyomene, in the Gabinetto delle Maschere, is doubtless a copy of a later edition of Praxiteles's celebrated Venus, possibly from the draped one that went to the city of Cos. She stands somewhat as does the Venus of Milos, with her head, however, bent down, while with both hands she arranges her unbound hair. The lines and masses are sweetly pleasing, but there is little of the majestic beauty of the goddess of love to be seen in this adaptation.

A copy of an adaptation is what the Hercules holding Telephos, in the Museo Chiaramonti, may be called. The original was presumably a group by Praxiteles. But most of the simple beauty of Praxiteles has been obscured. Even the lion's skin is more theatric. The attitude, too, is changed, and the child is awkwardly placed on the left arm. The Hercules in Villa Albani is a better copy of a better adaptation. In the head of the one in the Chiaramonti, however, the main points of the Praxitelean Hercules are faithfully preserved. Even the general plan of the forms corresponds with the Hermes of Olympia. The modelling of the forehead is similar, though more powerful, and eyes, lids, sockets, nose, and profile correspond exactly. Only in details like the hair and lower eyelid occur the differences of treatment always found in a copyist's work. It is undoubtedly the most beautiful head of the hero except the beardless Scopasian type. In it, too, one finds resemblance to another noted type, — Zeus of Otricoli. Not because they are the work of one master, but because of "one development and one age." This head is probably a copy of the second Attic school.

In a similar group is Silenus with the infant Bacchus in his arms. On one of the pedestals in the Braccio Nuovo, it is not a first-class copy of what, to judge by the numerous replicas, must have been a famous group of antiquity. Silenus stands with his left leg sharply advanced, leaning with his left elbow on a tree-stump twined with grape leaves. His head is bent protectingly over the little Bacchus whom he holds in his arms. This baby was hardly more than a torso when found, but it is perhaps in the main correctly restored. Silenus's beautiful hands, with the tender pressure upon the little body so charmingly indicated, are after all much too modern in treatment to go with the rest of the body in its simpler lines. The god-guardian is a graceful, almost noble figure. His animal nature is scarcely hinted at. Only the pointed ears show connection with the usual presentations of this nurse of the god of wine. Such soft idealisation, as well as the easy quiet of his attitude, recalls the Praxitelean manner. The more naturalistic treatment of the two bodies, however, indicates that probably it is a copy of a work of days as late as Lysippus. Another variant of this same group is the one where Silenus leans completely on the tree at his side, with his legs crossed.

There are innumerable statues of Dionysius, one of the better known being in the Museo Chiaramonti, where he is grouped with a satyr. It was found at Frascati, and has been restored only in minor parts. Attempts have been made to connect this, too, with the time of Praxiteles. But the slight archaic traces discernible, such as the lack of fuller modelling of chest and abdomen, proclaim it a copy of an earlier work. Over his grape-crowned head, with its soft, dreamy expression, Dionysius has flung his right arm. His left, holding a wine-cup, is about the satyr's neck, who, with his arm behind Dionysius, seems, as he looks up at him questioningly, to be urging the god forward. There is more of the lower order of being shown in the satyr than in the Dionysius.

The colossal statue of Hercules in gilded bronze, in the Rotunda, was found in 1864, in digging the foundations for a house in the Piazza Biscione. It was actually buried in a kind of coffin of solid masonry veneered with marble, and was purchased by Pius IV. for ten thousand dollars. The Theatre of Pompey used to be on about this spot, and the statue, it is guessed, was one of the works of art used for its adornment. It had apparently some time fallen upon its head, and an extremely flattened appearance is the consequence. It represents the young hero as an immensely heavy, powerful figure, with both feet firmly planted on the ground, the weight a little more upon the right leg. His right hand rests upon his club, and the lion skin covers the left forearm. In his right hand he holds the apples of Hesperides. These apples, left foot, and most of the club have been restored. The lost piece of the back of the head has never been replaced. This seems to be an adaptation if not a copy of the Hercules of the Scopas order. It bears a good deal of resemblance to the Hercules of the Lansdowne House, which is generally regarded as a good copy of that work of the Attic master.

During the pontificate of Leo X., the two enormous mythologic groups of the Nile and the Tiber were found near the Church of S. Maria Sopra Minerva. They were apparently part of the decoration of the Temple of Isis that stood near here. The Tiber was not returned by the French after Napoleon's defeat and still rests in the Louvre. The Nile is now in the Braccio Nuovo. Clement XIV. had it restored by Gaspare Sibilla. The restorations include, besides unimportant patchings, the fingers of the god's right hand, and the ears of corn within them, the toes, nearly all the upper parts of the children, and sometimes even more. The work probably dates from the time of the Ptolemies at Alexandria. The large figure of the god is half reclining, half sitting, his left elbow resting upon a statue of the sphinx. His right hand holds a bunch of ears of corn, while his left hand grasps a twining cornucopia, which is filled with grapes, corn, and fruits, with a small boy crowning the apex of the contents. The mild, benevolent head of the god is turned toward this laughing baby, but his eyes are not upon him. He is rather gazing out and beyond, as if viewing the immense territory his river must nourish. All about him in extremely well-chosen attitudes and groups are sixteen putti, who, in their chubbiness and interested actions, somehow suggest Rubens's little gods of love. They are clambering up his arms and legs, playing with a crocodile at the foot of the god and with an ichneumon at his side. Their number indicates the sixteen cubits which was the maximum rise of the Nile, and was needed to render the whole country sufficiently fertile.

Another statue in which a river god figures is that of the group of the City Goddess Tyche and the River God Orontes in the Galleria dei Candelabri. It is thought to be a far copy of a work by Euty-chides of Sikyon, a pupil of Lysippus. He is said to have worked in marble as well as bronze and also to have been a painter. There are echoes of this Tyche on Antioch coins and in this marble statuette. The goddess rests carelessly on a rock, a graceful, gentle figure, very different from the stately goddesses of olden days. The river is a vigorous youth, apparently swimming out from under her feet, bearing the goddess of the city on his back through the waves. Such a composition can scarcely be beautiful as a whole. In spite of the outreaching arms of the boy, the base is not large enough for the massive figure above. The drapery is simple, with large, free folds, but without the exquisite study and inevitableness of the Phidian frieze. There is an added significance to this statue, inasmuch as the creator of the magnificent Winged Victory in the Louvre has been said to be the author of the original of this. Some slight indications seem to connect the two, as well as the mannerisms that place them at about the same date, — the third century before Christ.

Among the many portrait busts and statues in the Vatican, perhaps the Demosthenes, the Menander and Poseidippus, the Alkibiades, and the Augustus are the most worthy of notice.

The head of the Demosthenes statue is well known from many duplicates, and is supposed to be a copy of the bronze original by Polycleitus, placed in Athens in 280 B. C. This stood with folded hands, the gesture used all through antiquity to express perplexity and often affliction. At a late date either this very bronze or a copy was seen in Constantinople. The statue in Rome has the lean arms, bared, bony chest, and scant drapery of the Athens group, but it carries a roll, instead of having the hands folded. Michaelis thinks this attitude was chosen because the statue was made when Demosthenes was admired more as the great author than as the afflicted patriot.

The two seated statues of the comic poets Menander and Poseidippus in the Galleria delle Statue are most excellent examples of the portrait work of perhaps the Hellenistic period. They rank nearly with the celebrated Sophocles in the Lateran Museum. Poseidippus, the Athenian dramatist of the "new comedy," flourished in the early part of the third century B. C. The preservation of the statue is extraordinary. There is nothing modern about it except the thumb of the left hand. It produces strongly the impression of being an original work, and also of being a speaking likeness. It may have been modelled in the actual presence of the subject, but in that case the name on the front of the plinth was doubtless inscribed later, when the figure was removed from its pedestal and taken to Rome. He is shown clean shaven, according to the fashion of the time of Alexander. The companion statue, Menander, is of equal merit. The two men are strongly contrasted in features, expression, and bodily carriage. Both show, as do many others of the same period, that no idea of the actual appearance of the Greeks can be gained from the purely ideal creations of Greek sculpture.

HEAD OF AUGUSTUS

Alkibiades in the Sala della Biga is, according to Furtwängler, badly restored. The whole of the right leg, the left leg from the knee, right arm from shoulder, and left arm from above elbow, — all are added, and all, claims the archæologist, wrongly. He stands with his foot on his helmet, he himself resting upon a tree-stump, his right hand placed on the upper part of his bent right leg, with his left arm held out from his body and slightly back. Furtwängler puts the whole figure on a run — with the right arm held forward and the left somewhat back, both hands loosely closed. He also claims that there is not a work in all the fifth century art with which this statue is more closely connected than with the creations known to be by Kresilas, — he who competed with Phidias and Polycleitus for the Amazon. Furtwängler goes on to say that he considers it a portrait statue of a winner of noted races. The original was of course in bronze and executed probably about 440.

One of the most beautiful of the statues of Roman times that have come down to us is that of Augustus, found in 1863, in Livia's Villa on the Via Flaminia, near Prima Porta, and now in the Braccio Nuovo. It was without much doubt done soon after the emperor's triumphant return from the north. The statue was broken when discovered, but only a finger, a bit of one ear, and its sceptre were lost. There are signs, however, that even in antiquity it had been restored in the right arm and left leg. Originally it was painted with purple, red, crimson, and blue, though now the colours are only faintly discernible. They touched up the finger rings, garments, hair, etc. He is standing with outstretched left arm, the right bending the paludamentum and the sceptre. The attitude is lordly, calmly majestic, and at the same time benevolent. His cuirass, with its exquisite reliefs, seems like the actual piece of metal. His hair is rather indicated than fully worked out, and the pupils are cut into the ball. The mantle is fine in the general arrangement, but has the sharpness in the finish of the breaks of the folds characteristic of this Græco-Roman time. At his foot on a dolphin rides a Cupid. Perhaps that was meant to indicate the emperor's descent from Venus, but it was needed, technically, for a support for the marble. It is much inferior in workmanship to the statue itself.

The Sala della Biga is so named from the Biga or two-wheeled chariot which stands there on a base of verde antique. The chariot is marvellously beautiful, of a marble most richly ornamented in reliefs. It is supposed to have stood in a temple dedicated to the Sun God. The bronze reins, the wheels, left horse, and portions of the right are restorations made by Frangoni under the orders of Pius VI., and the effect of the whole with the spirited animals and the rich trappings is gorgeously impressive. The chariot was for a long time used for an episcopal chair in the choir of St. Mark's.

While the treasures of the Vatican were reposing in the Louvre, Canova was called upon both to restore many broken marbles that were being unearthed and to create new works. It was to him that was largely due the reviving of the love for the classic. Three of his most noted sculptures are in the Cortile in the Gabinetto di Canova. Sincere, earnest, with a strongly marked idealistic temperament, he could love the antique, but to produce any such masterpieces was far beyond his powers. The futility of the modern attempt is never more glaringly shown than here among the great examples of the old days. Even the poorest stage of Greek art never descended to such theatric effects as are seen in his Perseus or the two boxers, who with their softly modelled muscles and overdone movements are far removed from the mighty athletes of the Greeks.

Perseus stands with his left foot far in advance of the right, his head turned in the same direction, while his left hand holds out the Gorgon's head. His right grasps the blade that has done the deadly work. Somehow, in spite of an undoubted faultlessness of line and proportion in this dainty, almost effeminate hero, there is little more than a picture of a drawing-room page. The age of Bernini is too apparent in this as in the Boxers, Kreugas and Damoxenos. The story of these pugilists is that Damoxenos won in a final contest between them by an unlawful, cowardly attack, striking Kreugas in the peritoneum with the extended fingers of his right hand, and so tearing out his entrails. Canova has markedly shown the animal nature of Damoxenos, not only in his face but in his whole build and position. Neither head, however, betrays much but a bulldog determination. Unfortunately, the big round muscles of the two fighters have a soft flabbiness entirely at variance with their profession.

A word at least should be said of the Galleria degli Animali. It contains a unique collection of domestic and wild animals, the work of ancient Greek and Roman sculptors. They are made of all kinds of coloured stones and marbles, — oriental alabaster, rosso and verde antico, breccia, Egyptian granite, porphyry, and paonozzo. “ Their connection with older religions surrounds them with a certain traditional dignity, and these enigmas of creation, in which the propensities of superstition discovered a mystic language intelligible only to the initiate, become objects almost of wondering curiosity as handed to us, through centuries, thus immortalised and beautified by art.”

CHAPTER IX.

THE PINACOTECA

UNTIL after the peace of Tolentino there was no real picture-gallery in the Vatican. When the treasures Napoleon had filched during his years of triumph were once more returned to the papal states, Pius VII. retained in Rome many of the paintings that before their pilgrimage to France had belonged to various churches and monasteries in Italy. The collection, compared with most of the picture-galleries of Europe, is small, and with a very few exceptions of minor importance.

Among the exceptions, however, are some masterpieces of the Italian Renaissance, one of them the work that for generations has been called the greatest picture in the world. Raphael's Transfiguration occupies, with his Madonna di Foligno and the St. Jerome of Domenichino, one of the four rooms of the Pinacoteca. The very last work achieved by the genius of Urbino, there is still doubt as to whether the Transfiguration was actually finished when Raphael died. Vasari states decidedly that it was, and that it was placed at the head of the painter's bier. At all events it is absolutely sure that Giulio Romano is responsible for parts of the picture. It is known that Raphael intended to paint this composition without any assistance. If he adhered to his determination, then Giulio merely finished what his master left incomplete. It is probable, however, that even in this case the young Urbinate found himself so pressed for time that he was obliged to fall back on his right-hand man, as Giulio had long since become.

The subject of the picture was given to Raphael by the Cardinal de' Medici, for whom it was painted. Critics who have found fault with its double perspective, its two halves, etc., have apparently forgotten this fact. He was obliged to illustrate two distinct incidents happening at the same time but far removed in space. The parents of a lunatic boy carry him to the disciples to be cured. At the moment of their arrival, on a distant mountain the Transfiguration takes place before Peter, James, and John. The painter, therefore, had to combine these two occurrences, and it is a carping critic who fails to admit the masterliness with which Raphael has accomplished it.

The mount rises somewhat above the centre of the picture. There, lying on the ground, awakened by the blinding rays, the three disciples half raise themselves and shade their faces from the overpowering brilliancy. Slightly above their heads, the Christ, with wide-reaching arms, rises into the heavens. On either side of him are Moses and Elias. Below, partly in the shadow of the mount, are the remaining disciples, a kneeling woman, and the crazed boy, who with starting eyeballs and open mouth is in a frenzy. He is held by his father and mother, whose grief-stricken faces tell how much they had counted upon the assistance of the vanished Saviour. The connection between the two divisions is made by the significant gestures of the apostles as they point to the mount. It is claimed that to Giulio Romano is due the concourse of people at the base of the mountain. The figures, however, were undoubtedly designed and grouped by his master. And in spite of some disagreeable colour and theatric massing of light and shade, many of them are wonderfully expressive. The woman kneeling in the immediate foreground is a noticeable example. It is only Raphael's genius that has saved her from the commonplace. She is not distinguished in face or form. Yet the poise of the figure, the twist of the torso, are so full of verve and movement that she stays in one's memory with a keenness like that produced by life itself. The apostles on the left, two pointing to the mount, others looking at the demented boy, and the man in the foreground, lifting his head from poring over his volume, are combined with a charm and skill equal to the kneeling votaries in the Disputa. The arrangement of light and shade, too, is wonderfully effective. Above, on the mount, it unquestionably is true that the figures are over large for the perspective of the picture. By painting all this part in a much higher key, Raphael evidently attempted to give it a sort of fictitious distance that would save the necessity of otherwise making the figures so small as to be insignificant. And for centuries the world has agreed that it is in just this upper half of the picture where Raphael's art is seen at its greatest. The transparency and purity of the colours, the amazing effulgence of the light that radiates from the Saviour and lingers over the ground where he had been praying, the nobility of his figure, the wonderful fall of the draperies that float about him as if caught by a celestial ether, and finally the sublimity of the expression of a face beyond words beautiful;—all this and more has been claimed for it with an utter abandonment to adjective and rhapsody. Even one who feels very differently must, after such an avalanche of adoration, hesitate to express opposing views. Nevertheless, a few critics have of late years ventured to suggest that, though of undoubtedly beautiful parts, as a whole the Transfiguration is neither the most perfect picture that was ever painted, nor is it

Raphael's own masterpiece. Certainly from a technical point of view it cannot be compared with the Sistine Madonna; and as certainly, it would seem, is it below that in its spiritual expressiveness. In spite of the nobility of Christ, the outflung arms with the flat open palms do recall, as Taine said, the gestures of a swimmer. And tender, benign, and soulful as is his face, it lacks the mysterious inner strength, the hidden, yet ever penetrating spirit that sees and knows and feels and has power to subdue, — the spirit that is a very part of both the Mary and the Babe of the Sistine.

The second of the three treasures of this chamber was painted more than ten years before the Transfiguration. Sigismondo Conti, chamberlain for Julius II., ordered the Madonna di Foligno about the time when Raphael was working in the Camera dell' Eliodoro. Conti wished to commemorate his escape from a meteor during the siege of Foligno, an escape he credited to the intervention of Heaven itself. The picture shows him in his red mantle and cape with fur linings, kneeling in the foreground of a landscape while the bolt is whirling across the sky. The mantle allows the full play of his arms, which are sleeved in brown. His face, thin, worn, is lifted in profile to the heavens, while Jerome, accompanied by his lion, rests his hand on the chamberlain's head. Jerome's gesture, as he calls the attention of Heaven to his charge, is full of dignity and a concentration that finds its strongest expression in his deep-set, piercing eyes. The vision above, to which they are both appealing, is that of Mary seated on the clouds in the centre of a circle of golden light. All about her swarm cherubs and angels, who seem partly to uphold her throne of clouds. Upon her right knee stands Jesus, whom his mother steadies by one hand on his shoulder, while with the other she grasps the muslin about his waist. He bends one arm across his breast, and with the other clutches with all ten fingers his mother's robe, his head at the same time turning toward the suppliants on the earth below. Perhaps the most exquisite bit of painting in the whole picture is that of the winged boy who stands holding a tablet near the kneeling Conti. His attitude is that of perfect repose, as graceful as it is natural. He it is that makes the connecting link between the group in the sky with the churchman on the one side and St. Francis on his knees on the other, with the Baptist beyond him, erect in his tunic of skins. He has the grandeur of head, the full, perfect modelling of limbs, the brilliant rendering of flesh, the subtile play of light and shade, characteristic of Raphael in his best moments. The treatment of the landscape and the figures of the Baptist and the Friar indicate that here he was perhaps assisted by Dossi. At any rate, they have not the breadth, the power, the full command of his highest powers that mark the rest of the picture.

Popular opinion has placed Domenichino's Last Communion of St. Jerome second to the Transfiguration alone in the Vatican collection. At the foot of the altar at the right is the emaciated and almost nude figure of the saint. He is supported by a young man, and is so near death that it is only with great difficulty that he can take the bread from the Pope, who, himself an old man, is bending far down toward him. On the left of the Pope kneels a young deacon with a green stola crossing from shoulders to hips. His head is turned in profile, and is mostly in deep shadow, only his white robe coming out sharply into the light. Behind him is another, a man in a gold-flowered red dalmatia, holding out in his right hand the chalice. Other figures are near the saint, one an old man weeping, while an old woman leans forward to kiss his withered arm. In the left-hand corner is the lion, his head upon his paws, apparently as full of grief as the human beings about him. Above in the air four little angels are flying, and through the arch behind the altar a landscape of trees, river, and houses is seen. The individual heads here are wonderfully finely discriminated. The colour is rich and deep, the draperies well studied, the massing firm and restrained. The saint is a finely characterised nude, and the young fair-haired deacon a beautiful, graceful figure. Altogether it is a work much ahead of most of those of the days of the decadence, and brings back fleeting memories of the halcyon times of Raphael.

Less popular but of far greater beauty than the St. Jerome is the Madonna of San Niccolò de' Frari by Titian. The lack of appreciation of this glorious picture was early shown by a most astonishing act of vandalism committed against it. Originally it was an arched panel. This arched part has been entirely cut off, and the dove which was shedding its rays upon the head of Mary is gone. Below this height, but still in the clouds, sits the Madonna, holding the Child in her lap. He is lifting a wreath while he looks down, as if he were about to drop it into the company below. Two charming little angels on each side of Mother and Babe are also holding wreaths. Below, within a curving, roofless temple are six saints. On the right St. Sebastian, his hands bound behind him and his body stuck all over with the arrows that do not change his serene expression. At the extreme left is St. Catherine Martyr, and next to her St. Nicholas in a magnificent golden robe with book and crozier. Between these are St. Peter carrying the keys and St. Francis and St. Anthony of Padua.

Here is all the Florentines ever got, and infinite else besides. No more admirable presentation of the nude human body than that of St. Sebastian can be imagined. As Vasari rather grudgingly remarks, it does not seem to be paint, but actual flesh itself. If there is no attempt made at a careful specialisation of type, if there is no great refinement in bodily forms, at least one has every reason to believe it was exactly what the Venetian tried to produce, — living, pulsing flesh. And even to-day, begrimed and varnished and retouched as it most unfortunately is, the marvel of those delicate tones melting imperceptibly into one another, the glow and texture of the velvety surface still show what it must have been in its best estate. As wonderful in its own way is the golden brocade of St. Nicholas. The very woof and web, the uneven roughness, the shine of the under golden threads, all is such a presentation of texture as can only be felt in the very cloth itself. Not less consummate are the expressions of the different faces, the attitudes of the individuals, the grouping of the whole and the scheme of chiaroscuro. And finally, when the dove was there to keep the upper part in its right relation, the balance of the whole as a composition must have been perfect.

In the group above there is such a wealth of beauties that it seems as if no side of the painters' art but was presented in all its power. Colour, — brilliant, tender, subtile; drawing, — graceful, every line full of life and movement, showing absolute command over every curve and joining; spacing and massing, — full of rhythmic charm and superb balance; and last, a sentiment of tenderness as penetrating as a lily's perfume. The glow of the child's flesh, the modelling of the softly rounded planes, the golden tone over all, has never been surpassed by Correggio, and here besides there is less the feeling of evident attempt. The Mother, bending over him, and looking below, is largely in shadow, the light striking her in a subdued glimmer on brow and nose. If she has not the depth of grandeur of the Madonna di San Sisto, she is far removed from the merely sweetly gentle faces that even Raphael was content to give most of his girl-mothers. There is a nobility of brow, a tender thoughtfulness in the shadowed eyes, a pensive strength in the curving lips, and a calm grace in the whole figure that properly place her where she is, above the world with the Holy Child within her arms. The scheme of colour below is, as it could not help being under Titian's brush, a symphony whose richness never degenerates to riotousness. The glowing flesh of St. Sebastian is answered by the brown frocks of the Franciscans, those in turn illuminated by the golden tones of St. Nicholas's brocade. The gloom of the shadowed niche is further relieved by the yellow robe of Peter and the crimson dress of Catherine. If the Roman public did not wholly realise the rare worth of this picture, the painter himself had a great fondness for it; he even drew a copy of it on wood with his own hands. St. Nicholas is supposed to be inspired by the Laocoön, a cast of a copy of which by Sansovino Titian always kept in his studio.

Besides the two already spoken of, there are in the Vatican several other pictures by Raphael. The Resurrection of Christ dates from his student days with Perugino, and indeed it is supposed to be a joint production of the two. To Perugino is given the credit of the general composition, to Raphael most of the execution. The two angels above on each side of the Lord are in Perugino's well-known style. They have apparently just flown to the positions they occupy, and, standing on one foot with the other extended, have their hands clasped and heads bent. Christ is rising out of the tomb within a rainbow-toned ellipse. The sleeping soldier is thought to be a portrait of Raphael, and the one running away is called Perugino. Altogether the picture has the defects of Perugino, a "want of ponderation and too great distance between the figures, though the fullness of the forms and the grace to be seen in persons is characteristic of Raphael."

The Coronation of the Virgin was executed probably in 1503. The scene is built in two parts, the lower consisting of the apostles gathered about the empty tomb of Christ, within which flowers are springing. In the upper portion, Christ, seated on clouds, a glory of angels about him, is placing a crown upon his mother's head. Some of the apostles below apparently see this group in the heavens. Their searching gaze is all that serves to connect the two parts. It would have been impossible for a young man in Perugino's workshop to be able fully to express twelve varying emotions on as many faces of different ages. Some of the disciples, therefore, show but slightly the astonishment they are supposed to feel. Their position and grouping, too, are somewhat perfunctory, with less ease and harmony than the later Raphael would have given them. Nevertheless, there are very beautiful faces and individuals, and the figures of Mary and Christ are remarkable for their pure and rounded beauty. The angels about the throne are lovely enough for Botticelli himself. The one beneath Christ, his head lifted with a certain indefinable melancholy, is much like one in the Sistine Madonna.

The predella which was once under this picture represents the Annunciation, the Adoration of the Magi, and the Presentation in the Temple. Already, though painted when Raphael was a mere lad, the art of the boy was strongly apparent. The Annunciation shows Mary sitting on one side of a portico supported by Corinthian columns. She has her head bent, and is sweet and thoughtful in expression. On the other side the angel comes toward her so swiftly and eagerly as scarcely to touch the floor. In the sky, seen through the arch, is God the Father sending down his messenger.

In the Adoration of the Magi, behind the monarchs, are the shepherds with a lamb. Thus he combined in one scene the subjects always before made into two pictures.

In the Presentation in the Temple there is an architectural background of the Ionic order. Simeon takes the child most tenderly from Mary, but the baby is afraid, and turns to his mother, holding out his hands appealingly, and giving a touch of nature that was seldom attempted before.

Perugino, the man under whose direction it is supposed that these works were accomplished, has several pictures of his own in the Pinacoteca.

His Three Saints is only a small part of a large painting that originally was over the high altar in a church in Perugia. There were pictures of five other saints, and the central part of the painting was an Assumption now in the Museum at Lyons. The lunette is in the Museum of St. Germain d'Auxerois. It was painted in 1495, and it is reported that he received five hundred ducats in gold for it. Vasari calls it the best painting Perugino ever did in Perugia. It was already divided into pieces before the seizure by the French, and the Pope left the Ascension in Lyons as a memento of his gratitude for the devotion shown him by that city.

The Three Saints now in the Pinacoteca are St. Benedict looking down, while St. Flavia and St. Placida with hands joined in prayer gaze heavenwards. There is in all of these much of the delicate sweetness and pure line of Perugino, but they are far from his highest achievement.

His Madonna Enthroned shows a very sweet and lovely maiden, seated on a heavy throne with a curving canopy under an archway. The Child stands on her knee, one hand tucked into the folds of her bodice. On each side stand two patron saints of Perugia: St. Lawrence, St. Ludovick of Tolosa, St. Herculanus, and St. Constantius. There is much expression in the saints' faces, and the picture is noted for its transparency of colour. It was painted for the chapel of the Palazzo Communale in Perugia, and went to Paris in 1797.

Lo Spagna, as Giovanni di Pietro is called, was the most noted of Perugino's scholars after Raphael. He kept pretty closely to the Peruginesque ideals, although in places he approaches Raphael's manner. His Adoration of the Magi in the Vatican is one of his early pictures, and has been variously assigned to Pinturicchio, Perugino, and even to Raphael. It is full of the Peruginesque delicacy and sweetness of expression, and has a sort of superearthy grace. On the ground in front lies the Holy Babe on a piece of cloth rolled up under his head like a pillow. At the right kneels Mary, at the left behind his head, Joseph, and with them are three angels. These five figures are really exquisite. Mary's tender homage that yet carries the mother-ownership, is very beautiful, and the gauzy, transparent veiling falling about her head emphasises her own flower-like beauty. St. Joseph has a fine head, too, full of thought and showing the years of work behind him. Each of the three angels in their varying attitudes is a charming picture of celestial grace. Above their heads in the sky are three others holding the scroll bearing the good tidings to man. Raphael has hardly done lovelier angelic beings. Advancing toward the Holy Family, still in the middle distance, is the company of the Magi. A corner of the shed showing the cow and ass is on one side between them and the mother. The colour is fresh and clear and transparent, the feeling throughout the whole is one of idyllic tenderness.

The Virgin Enthroned with Two Saints, by Fra Angelico, has some of the characteristic and lovely attributes of this painter. The Virgin sits holding the Child on her arm, with a white rose in her other hand. The Child's little body is a trifle archaic and woodeny in construction, but it has the naïve grace and innocence always found in Fra Angelico. The Madonna herself is sweetly contemplative, while the Child caresses her cheek. Seraphim, with flames coming from their fair heads and robed in blue and rose-coloured tunics ornamented with gold, are hovering round them. At the foot of the throne are St. Dominic with the lily and St. Catherine. These are frankly out of proportion, being much too small for the prominent place they fill. The background is of gold.

The fresco by Melozzo da Forlì, which once ornamented the library of Sixtus IV., was, to its great harm, transferred to canvas, and now hangs in a dark place between windows in the Pinacoteca. It is called Platina before Sixtus IV. On a stately chair at the right sits the Pope, in profile. In front kneels Platina, and here one feels that the keen face with its heavy hair, its firmly marked chin and nose, must have been an excellent portrait. By the side of the Pope are his nephew Giuliano, and Rafaello, son of Antonio Sansoni, and Violante Riario. Behind Platina are Giovanni della Rovere, Pope in 1475, and Girolamo Riario. The fine spacing of figures, careful drawing, graceful architecture, all make this a very excellent work.

Another Coronation of the Virgin is by Pinturicchio. In front of an ellipse of golden rays studded with gems, Christ is placing a crown on the head of the kneeling Mary. On each side is a lovely angel carrying a musical instrument, their robes blowing in the wind. Below are twelve apostles, and St. Bernardin, St. Francis, St. Anthony of Padua, St. Louis of Tolosa, and St. Bonaventura. The figures of this composition are full of interest, and are youthful in shape, but have lost their transparent colouring, and have been sadly hurt by bad varnish. Here and there on the mountains of the landscape-background are groups of sportsmen. The upper part is a fine example of Pinturicchio. The lower is said not to be his work.

The Madonna of the Monteluca is by Raphael's two noted pupils, Giulio Romano and Francesco Penni. In the upper part is Christ crowning Mary, and in the lower are the disciples grouped round her tomb, now filled with flowers. This was done after Raphael's death, but perhaps somewhat after his designs. It was a picture he had promised the nuns of Monteluca. The Madonna is Raphaelesque, and the figures below, though their heads are in certain ways like Perugino, show such violent action, especially with their open hands, that it is easy to see how these two pupils of the Urbinate were influenced by Michelangelo, — greatly to their own harm. The upper part is considered to be by Romano, the lower by Penni.

Cesare da Sesto, who died about 1524, was late in his life a friend of Raphael. He was an eclectic painter, sometimes imitating Raphael and sometimes Leonardo, some of his work having been ascribed to the latter painter. The Madonna of the Belt in the Vatican was credited to Da Sesto, but critics now call it merely a poor picture of the late Lombard-Milanese school. It is a circular panel, the Madonna seated, with heavy clouds rising behind her like a huge chair back. The infant Christ upon her lap is unfolding the belt before St. Augustine. To the right is St. John the Evangelist, with a scroll in his hand. The faces are small, pointed, insignificant, with no beauty of arrangement in pose or grouping.

Far inferior to the Madonna dei Frari is Titian's Doge Giovanni Mocenigo. The bust is life-size, turned in profile to the left, on a reddish gray ground, now spoiled by retouching. With its enormous pointed nose and very inadequate chin, the face is too marked not to have been an excellent portrait. The eyes are small, sunken behind many wrinkles, the lower lip projects heavily, as if to make up for the retreating chin below. It came from the Aldobrandi collection in Bologna. The face, right hand, and background have been all repainted. Yet even in its present state there are hints of the warm colours of the master. An elaborate brocaded cloak covers his fleshy figure.

Francesco Francia's Virgin, with Child on her lap and St. Joseph at one side, is not one of his best known works, but has the sweet piety of his Madonnas with some of his pearly flesh tones. It is said that Raphael declared that Francia's Madonnas were the most devoutly beautiful he knew. Her large dark eyes and perfect brows in this panel are very lovely and fine in line.

There are a number of pictures by Guercino, whose name was Giovanni Francesco Barbieri, surnamed Guercino da Cento. He was noted for his grace, as well as a decided power and depth of expression, with a charming knowledge and use of chiaroscuro. Later in life his works became more sentimental and thinner. His Incredulity of St. Thomas in the Vatican is one of his more important works. Christ stands with his robe pulled off his left shoulder and chest, showing the wound, while his left hand grasps a pole from which the ends of a white flag float about his head. St. Thomas, his head thrown into a deep shadow, except where the light strikes him sharply on the neck and ear, leans forward, putting his finger into the wound in Christ's side. Other disciples are behind. The management of the light and shade is masterly, the chiaroscuro all through most effective. The Saviour's face, as he stands in profile, is full of beauty, not without strength. Infinite pity shines from his eyes as he looks upon the intense, questioning face of the bearded Thomas, rugged in its simplicity and honesty. This was one of the few pictures already in the Vatican before it was taken to Paris.

St. Margaret of Cortona is also by Guercino. She is in the dress of a Franciscan nun, and kneels on the altar steps, a halo about her head, her eyes turned upwards, her hands clasped. Above her head two angels are flying, pointing still higher. The picture is not good, and perhaps not wholly by him. Equally poor is the Bust of St. John, in his later style.

A very strong picture is Poussin's Martyrdom of St. Erasmus. The saint is spread out nude upon a log of wood. While one executioner is disembowelling him, another is winding the intestines about a mill as a rope. Beside the half-dead martyr is a pagan priest, pointing at the statue of Hercules. Behind him is an armed captain on horseback, showing some horrified spectators the deed taking place in front. St. Erasmus's mitre and robes are on the ground near the block of torture. Above are seen two angels with the crown and palm of victory. The light is thrown sidewise upon the white-robed priest, and shines upon the chest and falling arms of the saint. All the rest is in shadow or half-shadow, lighted only in the outlines. Here are big, broad massing, magnificent drawing, freedom of action and movement. The colour is somewhat thin, but the skilful chiaroscuro helped to neutralise that fault. The saint, drawn down on the torture rack with his head bent far back, is a very wonderful accomplishment.

Murillo is very poorly represented, though his Marriage of St. Catherine has some fresh, charming colour suggesting the Venetian school. It was given to Pius IX. by Queen Christine of Spain in 1855. The Adoration of the Shepherds, though attributed to him, is at best only a smaller copy of one in the Museum of Seville. Mary half kneels by the cradle, from which she partly lifts the baby, while she draws away the light covering. The shepherds kneel about, the light that is focussed upon the holy pair reflecting on to the one in front. Mary is sweet and lovely, but the whole composition borders on the commonplace.

Two very attractive canvases are by Federigo Barocci, though neither of them represents him at his very best. One shows St. Michelina standing on the Mount of Calvary, her arms thrown forward in ecstasy. Her pilgrim's hat and staff are on the ground, her mantle is blown about by the wind. It was executed for the Church of S. Francesco, in Pesaro, where it remained till 1797, when it was taken by the French. Barocci had a tenderness, an idyllic sweetness of manner without any very great depth of meaning. His colour, though pleasing and sometimes extremely soft and harmonious, is too red in the "carnations." His positions, too, are apt to be affected, and his sentiment degenerate into sentimentality.

ANNUNCIATION

By Baroccio; in the Pinacoteca

Escaping this last fault, yet not rising to his very highest achievement, is his delightful Annunciation, not far from the St. Michelina. Mary, who is a dainty, youthful figure rather heavily draped, kneels at the left of an open window, through which castle walls and lines of a city can be seen. In front of her, on one knee, is the angel with the branch of lilies. There is a soft luminosity to the colour of Mary's face that is perhaps a trifle overemphasised by the pink of her cheeks. Very tender, however, are the high forehead and delicate eyebrows, with a faint suggestion of Orientalism about them. The angel, though not impeccable in drawing, is a radiant being with a wonderfully lovely head and neck, and golden curls that lie tenderly against the soft modelling of temple and neck.

Bonifazio II. has a Holy Family which has been repainted, but still carries many characteristics of the Venetian who at his best nearly equalled Palma Vecchio. Mary, seated in the middle of the picture, is a matronly figure of the rather florid Venetian type, with a sweet, not too expressive face. The child on her knees has been repainted so much that there is little left of the original. At Mary's side is St. Elizabeth, from whose basket she takes some roses. The little St. John is at the extreme left, seated upon a lamb, and at the right St. Joseph and Zacharias are conversing. St. Elizabeth is almost as young, and has a more interesting face than Mary. The two old men are splendidly done, their heads, though almost identical in beard and hair, possessing an individuality as fine as is the modelling.

An Entombment by Amerighi da Caravaggio is one of his best works. The figures are magnificently drawn, in striking, original grouping, with a colour as glowing in the light as it is deeply mysterious in the voluminous shadow which is over most of the picture. The draperies are beautifully indicated, and if heavy have a fall of line and mass almost unexcelled. Christ, supported by Nicodemus and John, is being laid into the tomb, while behind stand the three Marys. It has been said to resemble a picture of the burial of a gipsy chief rather than that of the Christ. Yet power, great dramatic feeling, and splendid technique it has in abundance. The figure of Mary, who has wept herself tearless, has seldom been surpassed in its expression of heart-wringing sorrow.

Not even by a second-rate picture is Correggio represented. The Christ upon a Rainbow, called his in the catalogues, has been credited by Morelli to a weak disciple of the Bolognese school of the last

"decadenza." The only part of the canvas distinctly recalling Correggio are the four little angels at Christ's feet. With their soft, luminous eyes and waving, golden curls they have something of the exquisite modelling and colour of the great painter. The figure of Jesus, on the contrary, is almost fuzzy in its overmodelling.

Much more satisfactory is the Martyrdom of St. Lawrence by Ribera. The saint is naked and on his knees before his executioners. Like all of Ribera's works, there is here the dramatic intensity in the forced contrasts of highest light and deepest shade. The figure of the saint is vigorously drawn and modelled, the arm that is grasped by one of the executioners being marvellously real in its straining muscle, with the white flesh gleaming against the red fingers of the torturer's heavy hand.

Veronese's St. Elena is a graceful, attractive panel, with the warm, soft colours and rich accessories of the Venetian school. Really enchanting is the little winged nude boy, who stands nearly back to in the right corner, bearing the cross of St. Elena's dream. The soft modulations in the curves of his tender little body are almost equal to Correggio.
